Please to heed what an autocrat direct from the salons of Paris has to say on the subject of bouquets. No more "composed bunches of flowers" are carried by the fashionable women in that dizzy capital. A beribboned bouquet is regarded as "bad form," only the Parisian has another phrase for bad form, and a dame of the haut monde now enters a salon carrying a spray or branch of some flowers in season, such as lilac or mimosa. In this land of extravagance, where all the flowers are always in bloom, she might hold a spray of orchids or a bunch of roses, but the arranged bouquet, jamais! The idea is to resemble the young martyrs in the pictures, these said martyrs generally holding in one hand a palm branch. Perhaps our florists will catch on to this new wrinkle and have some extraordinarily lovely blooms prepared for their fair customers.—Boston Herald.

Pleasantly Expressed.

A humorous writer thus describes how he got out of a bad scrape at the police court: The next morning the magistrate sent for me. I went to him, and he received me cordially, said he had heard of the wonderful things I had accomplished by knocking down five persons and assaulting six others, and was proud of me, for I was a promising young man. Then he offered a toast, "Guilty or not guilty?" I responded in a brief but eloquent speech, setting forth the importance of the occasion that had brought us together. After the usual ceremonies I was requested to lend the city forty shillings.

A Speculation.

"Chollie is in great glee today."

"Why?"

"He owed his tailor $565 for five years, and the tailor got mad and put the account up at public auction."

NOTED AND QUOTED.

The amount involved in the famous hat trimmings case, which has just been decided against the government, is a very large sum of money, and will probably exceed $15,000,000, representing the excessive duty that was levied on ribbons that were really hat trimmings, the duty on the former under the old tariff law being 50 per cent., and on the latter 20 per cent. It is to be remembered that the consumers of these goods have already paid the importers hanced retail prices, and now the importers will recover the overpaid duties, though their consumers to whom the goods were sold at the high tariff price will not be benefitted. The importers will be $15,000,000 richer and the people a like sum poorer.

Dr. Dwight of Yale is a very sensible man. Since the race at New London he has followed Van Motke's example and been silent in all the languages taught at the university.

The mayor of Aurora, Ill., goes Speaker Reed several better on the quorum business. He not only counts silent members as present, but he casts all their votes in favor of the side they are trying to obstruct.

The democrats, according to the Des Moines Register, "have again inaugurated a campaign to destroy the peace and happiness of Iowa and the business prosperity of the state."

A canvass of Frenchmen has been made on Tolstoi's denunciation of tobacco and alcohol as agents that destroy the moral conscience. Gounod thinks they produce sluggishness and therefore affect the will, but not the conscience, which is a divine decree. Richepin condones the use of stimulants which, producing a dream of forgetfulness, result in renewed strength. He himself, however, has abandoned smoking. Zola says he does not drink wine for the reason that it does not agree with him. He disagrees with Tolstoi's opinions and regards the use of stimulants as a mere matter of bonhomie. Dr. Charcot thinks Tolstoi's tenets exaggerated and false. He says stimulants are injurious but may be used in moderation.

Life insurance companies and agents will endow a chair in the Chicago university which will give mathematical instruction on mortality rates, etc., and endeavor to confer on the business the dignity of a profession. Isn't this rather crowding the higher education movement to death?—Springfield Republican.

The boys are besieging the entrances of the leading colleges and universities in greater numbers this year than ever before. Such a cry for education comes from the masses of no other country on earth. It appears, also, that the greatest colleges, like the biggest dry-goods houses, get the bulk of the trade, while many a small institution bewails the fact that its classes are not larger.

The Pall Mall Gazette of London, referring to the statements published in the society papers, which have connected Lady Brooke with the inquiry arising from the baccarat incidents at Tranby Croft, says that it is understood that Lord and Lady Brooke have instructed George Lewis to take criminal proceedings against papers circulating these "unfounded and malicious libels."

A company of Union and confederate veterans has been organized at Kansas City, Mo., to consist of 100 men, all at least five feet ten inches tall, who shall be equally divided in numbers between the blue and the gray. The Union veterans will wear blue slouch hats and blue Prince Albert coats, while the confederate veterans will wear gray garments of the same cut and material.

George Francis Train, who is trying to round the globe in 55 days, missed his connection at Hong Kong, but is still hopeful of getting on without great delay.

General Butler in his autobiography will say that the three greatest American lawyers who have lived in the 19th century are Jeremiah Mason, Daniel Webster and Rufus Choate. Who the fourth one in order of merit may be, the general doesn't tell us; but he has his opinion just the same.

Tin Plate Makers will come to America

It is estimated that 25,000 tin plate operatives are idle today in consequence of the shut-down resolved upon by the master several weeks ago. Involved in this suspension of work are 4000 colliers besides many iron workers who will be similarly idle before the end of the week. The ironworks have insisted upon four stops per week, which has been effectual in restricting production.

It has been announced publicly that during the coming month sixty representative men from the now idle operatives will visit the United States probably with the effect of ascertaining what facilities exist for transferring their services to America. Should they report favorably, it is not unlikely that a considerable exodus will occur, and that every large portion of the tin-plate trade, which has hitherto been confined to Wales, will be transferred to the United States.

The original oak shingles are still on the roof of a Reading, Pa., house built in 1750.

Judge—And I understand that you prefer charges against this man? Grocer—No, sir; I prefer cash and that's what I had him brought here for.

He—You say that tight shoes hurt you terribly; then why do you wear them? She savagely—Because they make me forget what an idiot you are.

You young scoundrel, said the father, seizing his disobedient boy by the neck, I'll show you how you ought to treat your mother! And he gave him several bangs on the ears and then shook him till his hair began to fall out.

Teacher—What are the names of the seven days of the week? Boy—Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday. That's only six days. You have missed one. When does your mother go to church. When pa buys her a new hat.

Ah! exclaimed Scrimper, as his eyes fell on a copy of the Venus of Milo, now that's my idea of what a woman should be. Yes, replied Brown, that is considered a model of beauty. Scrimper—Oh it isn't that; I was thinking what a saving in gloves it would be to have a wife like that.

Complete House Furnishing Emporium.

What is an Emporium? What goes into its make up? Why the term? The term at once suggests something large. A business conducted on an extensive scale. A mart of trade where everything of a special branch or several branches of a particular line are gathered together under one head. Such a combination properly managed affords at once immense advantages over single department stores. Advantages in the way of trading with one salesman. Buying your goods at one place. Quicker service. Contracting a single bill in place of three or four. And lower prices ALWAYS from the fact that the items of expense in running such a store are made smaller in a dozen ways. Such is our Emporium, and its popularity is best attested by our constantly increasing trade. Remember that we have four floors fully stocked with GOODS THAT SELL.

MEMORY GONE!

Ye Suffering Ones.

WINDSOR, ME., Oct. 1, 1890.

DANA SARSAPARILLA CO.:

Gentlemen: I am now sixty-four years of age, and have been failing rapidly for several years. Disagreeable noises in my head gave me no rest. My memory failed me, until I could not remember the common occurrences about my work for TEN MINUTES AT A TIME. I lost strength very fast, until I seemingly had no strength. I would have to sit down several times while washing my dishes.
After reading your strong testimonials
I decided to try DANA'S SARSAPARILLA.
I have taken three bottles. The NOISES IN MY HEAD CEASED before I had taken one bottle. MY STRENGTH HAS RE-TURNED so I do my work without fatigue.
I have a good appetite, sleep well nights,
and my MEMORY HAS RETURNED.
For all of which I am very thankful, and know that the praise belongs to DANA'S SARSAPARILLA.

Yours truly,

MARY A. ALBEE.

SILVER WEDDING.

Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Lloyd Celebrate their 25th Anniversary.

On the evening of July 3, the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Lloyd, 37 Oak street, was the scene of a very pleasant and enjoyable occasion when the many relatives and host of friends assembled to extend their sincere congratulations to the genial host and hostess on the 25th anniversary of their marriage.
They were the recipients of many elegant gifts which were both useful and ornamental, among which was a silver tea service, a coffee service, a silver water pitcher and a piano lamp, and many other gifts too numerous to mention.

The evening was devoted to instrumental music, singing and readings.
Supper was served at a late hour and all were merry as a marriage bell until the early hours of morning, when the guests retired with sincere congratulations, and wishes that they might be permitted to meet again to celebrate the golden wedding of the youthful host and hostess, who, in the estimation of their dearest friends, will never grow old as old time gently waves his wand over them. May they be crowned with success and retain as now, the love and good wishes of their many friends, which they so richly deserve.

The passing years in rapid flight,
Have ushered in the time
When wedding bells again ring out,
A glad and joyous chime.
And we to-night have gathered here,
With loving hearts to greet
These two, who've travelled year by year
Along life's rugged steep.

The joy bells rang long years ago,
When first their plighted love
Was given to each other here,
And sealed by God above.
Then weeks of joy and days of pain,
Succeeded one by one,
But still the star of love shone on,
To hide the darkened sun.
With feet placed firm on love's own rock,
And hands together clasped,
They breasted every coming wave,
And every chilling blast.

And after twenty-five long years,
We celebrate the day that made them one,
And greet you all
While tenderly we pray.

In years to come may life's rough path
Be smoothed by God's own hand,
Until all meet in Heaven above,
An undivided band.

Composed by Mrs. Belle Estey and read by Mamie Trask.

Do not neglect to purify your blood

Ladies are securing genuine bargains at the regular weekly sales of W. G.
Webber & Co. "They sell as they advertise." That is what a lady was heard to say in an Essex Electric car just as she stepped in from Webber's store, the other day.

Dennis McCarthy was arraigned this week charged with using indecent language upon an Essex Electric car, and fined $15.00. He had been previously fined $10.00 for a similar offence, having used indecent language while being arrested for drunkenness.

The Essex Electric Street Railway company, carried on the Fourth 5593 passengers. This is the largest business ever done by the road, and in proportion to the capital, and mileage, was more than was done by the Naumkeag company. The traffic to the Willows was three to one in favor of the Essex Electric.

The name of W. Perley White of the West Lehigh was omitted from the list of successful applicants for admission to the High School last week. His examination papers were examined after the others and so his name was let off the general list. He was the only applicant from West Peabody.

The High School base ball team played a game Wednesday with the United Stars. In the middle of the ninth inning the score was even 15 to 15. The High School captain put in a new pitcher and the Stars refused to complete the game. The Umpire declared the withdrawal a forfeiture.

The Salem Board of Aldermen have granted permission to the Essex road to lay a turnout in the Block House Square to accommodate the Willows travel on condition that guard wires be strung over their trolley wire through the city, to prevent accidents by other wires falling upon the trolley wire.

The condition will be accepted and work will be pushed vigorously. The North street turnout at the junction of new Bridge street has just been completed. This will avoid the long waits on Buffum street and afford better time from Peabody to Salem.

The Second Congregational Church at South Peabody has extended a call to Rev. F. I. Kelley of Pigeon Cove to fill the pulpit recently vacated by Rev. Israel Ainsworth. The call has been accepted and on Sunday the prospective pastor tendered his resignation to his Rockport society. He will commence his labors in the South Peabody parish about the first of September. The salary will be $1100, and as the West Peabody church has been set apart from the Second parish since the resignation of Rev. Mr. Ainsworth, who severed his connection with the society chiefly on account of the great amount of labor involved in filling two pulpits, the new pastor will be relieved of the extra burden.

THE NEWVILLE MURDER

EDITED BY ALFRED B. TOZER

CHAPTER X.
CONTINUED BY THE KEEPER OF THE DEAD HOUSE.

At last faint glimmerings of his former life came back to him.

I have been shown the contribution of Mr. Edward L. Pelton and asked to take up the story where he laid it down. In the winter of 1863-4 I was employed in the Federal hospital camp to which he refers. I remember all about the camp, for I had some startling experiences there. What I know about Private Maurice Green can be set down in few words.

To begin with, I never knew the man in his lifetime. It was in my official capacity as keeper of the hospital dead room that I received him on the morning following the accident which caused his death. I had work enough on my hands in those days, God knows, for the poor fellows were dying right and left, and I am now able to recall Maurice Green to my mind only on account of the unusual manner of his death. I prepared his body for the grave, and it was my hands that set above his last resting place the pine board that bears his name. Now for the first question: How do I know that the man I helped to bury on the day following the explosion was Maurice Green? Let me answer the question by asking one. Why should the attendant in the ward in which he died report a false name to me? Surely the attendant could not have been mistaken in the man. Surely he could have had no motive in deceiving me.

Look at the common sense of the thing. The attendant had fed and nursed him through an attack of brain fever. If such an experience as that won't post one man as to the identity of another, what will?

Then again, the man Pelton is pleased to call the foraging soldier did not belong in Pelton's ward. So only one man under his care was killed by the explosion. The wounded were taken back to their beds, and the only dead man he was responsible for he brought to me in person. You must admit that the wounded men knew their own beds.

Stop! I remember now that one of the wounded men lay moaning for weeks and weeks, and never knew until long afterward to whose kind offices he owed his recovery. Then his mother came from New York and took him away. You can't argue with me that this self-sacrificing mother, not knowing her own son, took another man away to her home. So that disposes of the question of identity which, I am told, has been raised in the case. Green was the only man who left Pelton's ward for good that night. Pelton's identification is therefore complete.

Stop again! I have been too fast, and I have a trifling confession to make. The case which looks so strong to me now did not seem so then. At the time I helped to bury Maurice Green I did not see fit to depend entirely upon the attendant's identification.

I presume my own observations made at the time amount to nothing, but I may as well set them down.

When the powder exploded in the hospital the men grouped about the fire were, for the purpose of increased warmth, wrapped in the blankets from their beds. The blankets bore numbers corresponding with the numbers of the beds to which they belonged. When the body of Maurice Green was brought to me his hands still clasped the blanket he wore at the time of his death. The number on that blanket was ninety-nine. The wardbook showed that the number of his bed was ninety-nine.

This satisfied me. I did go so far as to make an examination of the dead man's pockets, but I found them to be empty. The clothing which had been brought to the hospital with him had been destroyed, and there was no record of the preservation of any article found on his person. Now you have all I know of the circumstances of Maurice Green's burial.

Now for the second question. What can I remember of the man from New York? In the first case I can't see what the case of Private Maurice Green has to do with the case of the man from New York. Perhaps that is no affair of mine. Whether it is or not I will obey orders.

Within a week of the time of the explosion the roads became passable and the hospital camp was broken up. There is no knowing how long our sick and wounded soldiers might have remained there only for the fact that the building had been shattered beyond repair by the accident.

The man from New York was in no condition to be moved. He was assigned quarters in a farm house a short distance from the site of the camp, and I was detailed to attend him. The prospect was a dreary one for me, but there is no such thing as a private's having his own way in the army, and I had to make the best of it. The only ray of hope I had to cheer me as the soldier guard marched away was conveyed in the last words of the officer making the detail:

"Lieutenant Melville's friends will soon arrive from the east," he said, "and then you can join your regiment."

Owing to the lack of proper transportation the young man's relatives did not reach him until three weeks had passed. When they did arrive he was still unconscious. They had learned of our exact whereabouts only after a visit to the camping place of the company which had acted as guard to the hospital. With their instructions for finding the farm house they had also received some written orders to be delivered to me. The orders were as short as they were disagreeable: "Stay with your charge so long as you can be of use."

I said just now that Lieutenant Melville was still unconscious when his relatives arrived. By relatives I mean his mother and a famous New York surgeon in some way connected with the family. He was more than unconscious. He was raving night and day like an insane person. His mother—a pale, aristocratic lady with perfect manners and a perfect face—sat by his side nearly a month before he recognized her.

The morning he regained consciousness his mother, acting under the directions of the surgeon, took his wasted hand in her own and called his name. The patient's eyes rested inquiringly for a moment upon the kind face above him and turned away. I was in another part of the room at the time, but the cry of anguish that came from the bedside the next moment told me what had happened. The wounded man, although seemingly in the full possession of his senses, had failed to recognize his mother!

The surgeon quieted the mother as best he might and led her away. Then began a systematic examination of the invalid's shattered mind. For days the surgeon's skillful efforts produced no hopeful results.

The injured man's brain retained not one incident of his life previous to the time he was struck senseless by the accident in the hospital. He did not even remember the occasion of his injury.

Lieutenant Melville had been a patient student, and had been regarded in his regiment as a well read man. Now every result of his early studies had passed from his mind. He could not even remember one single event of his home life. His mind was an absolute blank.

At last, by such patient efforts as only a mother could exert, faint glimmerings of his former life came back to him, scenes of his childhood coming first and most distinctly. At first he recognized only such scenes as were suggested to him time after time by his mother's loving words. Then he began to ask questions regarding circumstances to which his attention had not been called. The joy of the mother at these faint evidences of her son's recovery is beyond my poor powers of description. The surgeon constantly warned her not to be too sanguine.

"You must remember," he said, "that the injury to Richard's brain was inflicted just as he was recovering from an attack of brain fever, when he was weak mentally as well as physically. I hope for the best, but it may be years before his brain recovers its former strength. Such cases are not rare. He will soon be well physically, but mentally he must begin life anew."

With this faint hope in her heart Mrs. Melville started home with her invalid son. I returned to my regiment, and the farmhouse and all I knew there passed out of my life.

CHAPTER XI. CONTRIBUTED BY CHARLES GATES.

"I can't bear to see you in that woman's company."

In the early days of this inquiry I took occasion to request of Mr. Richard Melville a private interview.

The exact time was the day following the interviews with the domestics of the Melville household. I made my request without consulting Mrs. Melville. If you desire to know why I did not first consult his mother, who was also my employer, I will quote you a few words from the first conversation I had the honor of having with that estimable lady: "My son is a Melville and a gentleman," she said at that time. "No servant ever had cause to complain of ill treatment at his hands." These are her exact words, and, well, my business with Mr. Richard Melville was to inquire into his relations with a servant. Now, you can see that I was right in not consulting his mother.

At first Mr. Melville positively refused to grant me the interview. I had not gone to him to find defeat. I refused to take no for an answer. My interviews with the domestics had put in my mind positive information that the housekeeper had been heard to address Richard Melville in terms and tones in which no servant should be allowed to address her master. She had been heard time and again to address Mr. Melville in terms of pleading, reproach and of anger.

I wanted to know what there was between Richard Melville and his mother's housekeeper. I put the question straight to him. Again he refused to answer, and again I insisted on being answered.

"If you have private and personal reasons for not complying with my request," I explained, "you can state them to me in confidence. In that case I pledge my word of honor that your confidence shall not be violated. If, however, any of your conversations with the housekeeper were upon matters connected, however remotely, with the death of my brother I shall insist upon all my questions being answered. I have no power to force you to speak of these matters in private. I have the power to force you to speak of them in public. I must leave you to decide the time and place—now and in private or tomorrow and in public."

To use a professional term, Mr. Melville weakened.

"I can't see how my private conversations with my mother's housekeeper can in any way affect the question of her guilt or innocence," he said. "I am informed that but for the protection of my mother the housekeeper would now be in the custody of the police. I believe the course my mother is pursuing to be the correct course. I do not think the poor woman should be taken to jail. She should be taken to a madhouse. In my opinion the housekeeper is insane. She has been insane since her husband was killed in the army."

"For the sole purpose of proving my position to be the correct one I am about to grant your request. You shall know what we talked about when the meddling servants overheard us. You shall know all that I know regarding her deformity of mind—all that I know regarding her claims on me."

"The housekeeper accused me then just as she accuses me now of being an impostor in Mrs. Clark Melville's house! She accuses me of being Maurice Green! She accuses me of being the man who married her in Maine and who died in the hospital!"

I can write down here the words spoken by Mr. Melville. I cannot describe the white heat of rage his voice and manners betrayed. That is beyond the power of any human pen. I have seen many a man in passion. I never saw a passion like that which had possession of Richard Melville at the time of that interview.

"She has been a curse to me ever since she came into the house," he continued. "When her own efforts proved futile to accomplish my disgrace, she set her brute of a brother on me—her coachman in disguise!"

In my mind I saw snares gathering about the feet of Mr. Richard Melville, but his passion was so great he saw nothing. He raved up and down the room like a maniac. I made no comment, but sat patiently waiting for him to go on.

"I know what you are about to ask me," he continued. "I will answer your questions in advance. I can't tell you why I did not turn both of the miserable creatures out of the house. Perhaps it was because their reproaches and demands annoyed without distressing me until Miss Clara Roberts arrived in the house. Up to that time I believed that the poor, deluded woman would soon discover her mistake. When she talked to me on the subject I think I always answered her in that way. I always refused to consider the matter seriously."

"I offered to give her the influence of my bank account and my name to aid her in her search for the husband she believed to be alive, but I refused to in any way discuss or argue the matter with her or her brother. All my offers were declined. She had only one thing to demand of me. That one thing was that I should recognize her as my wife before my mother and before all the world."

"When Miss Clara Roberts came to us she came as my promised wife. From that time on I had no rest, night or day. Wherever I went the housekeeper threw herself in my way. Wherever I went her reproaches filled my ears. 'I can't bear to see you in that woman's company,' she would say, wringing her hands and crying as you saw her wring her hands and cry at the inquest. 'You are my lawful husband. I won't have you making love to her!'"

"My pity for the woman alone restrained me from confiding the condition of affairs to my mother and requesting her to have the housekeeper examined as to her sanity. More than once I sought my mother for the purpose of making the disclosure. Each time my courage failed me. She is still ignorant of her housekeeper's preposterous claims."

"I realize that I am treading on dangerous ground in stating these facts to you. I have shown you that I had a motive in the coachman's death. That is what the public officers would say. The public officers, as usual, would find themselves mistaken. My safety depended on the life of the mad woman's brother. Let me explain:

"It is now my firm belief that the coachman grew in time to realize the mistake his sister had made regarding me. He is known to have quarreled with her almost constantly for a month prior to his death. There is only one thing they could have quarreled about; that one thing was the question of dropping or pressing their claim against me."

"Without the aid and countenance of her brother the woman's claim against me was certain to fall to the ground. I believe the coachman to have been an honest man. He had become satisfied in his own mind that his sister was mistaken. He refused to aid her in wrecking the life of an innocent man."

"Regarding all their charges against me, I make to you a firm denial. Being Richard Melville, it is impossible that I should be Maurice Green. Take from my life the few months when I suffered from the explosion in the hospital, and my memory establishes my identity beyond a doubt. It would establish it in any court of law. Ask the family surgeon who brought me back to life and reason in the farmhouse. Ask my early friends whom I recognized upon my recovery, and whom Maurice Green could not have known. Then if you are still in doubt as to my identity and the housekeeper's sanity, ask my mother, Mrs. Clark Melville."

"About the life of Maurice Green I know nothing. I remember the man. He was instantly killed by the accident that wounded me. I have heard that it was claimed by persons in the hospital that he resembled me. I don't believe it."

THE LATEST fad of the summer sojourners is a labyrinth. A New Jersey firm is constructing an extensive arrangement which combines many doors that can only be opened from one side, thus shutting the wanderer up between apparently solid walls, where he is left to puzzle his way out. The fad is taking immensely, and it is expected that portable labyrinths will be constructed for the use of cities in winter.

An exchange very aptly remarks "they are excellent things for nervous people to keep away from."

THE EXECUTION of the four murderers, Joseph Wood, Harris A. Smiler, James Floum and Shibus Jugario, the Jap, at Sing Sing, Tuesday morning, was a perfect success and a striking contrast to the bungling butchery of Kemmler, the first who suffered the death penalty in the electric chair. The current was turned on and life was extinguished without a murmur, in the twinkling of an eye.

A laudable attempt was made on the part of the prison authorities to keep the facts regarding the executions as secret as possible. Warden Brown kept the witnesses of the scene in close confinement, so to speak, until time for departure of trains that were to carry them to their homes, and then they were sent to the station in prison wagons to prevent interviews of inquisitive representatives of the press.

It is said the practice of going to Europe is becoming more frequent and general among the common or middle classes every year. Rates are so low and the passage can be made so quickly that almost anybody can cross the ocean for a short vacation. The various places of interest in this country east of the Mississippi river have been visited by a majority of the traveling public, and the wonders of Yellowstone Park and the picturesque views among and beyond the Rockies are not unfamiliar to many. Naturally a desire to view the points of interest in the old world is thus awakened, and during the summer months, instead of a visit to the mountains, seashore or mineral springs, hundreds indulge the desire for "new worlds to conquer."

Hence the throng that one sees on almost every steamer that sails for Europe during the warm weather. Business relations also create a great deal of travel toward the old world at all seasons of the year. The merchant of today thinks as little of a trip to Europe as in former times he did of a journey to New York or Philadelphia. Increased facilities for transportation augment the number of travelers, whether by ocean steamship, inland railroad or local trainway, until it seems as if there is no end to the spirit of progress.

The following paragraph appeared in the Salem Evening News of Tuesday:

"Most of the water used at the Naumkeag cotton mills comes from Bartholemew's pond in South Peabody, the supply being obtained by wooden pipes which were laid in 1793. In that year the Salem Aqueduct company was organized, the original water works consisting of three hoghead tubs which were sunk into the pond which is made up of springs. The elevation was and is sufficient to run into the wooden pipes and furnish quite a good supply in Peabody and Salem by gravity."

An erroneous impression would be gathered from the article by one unacquainted with the true facts. We presume it must have been sent in and found its way to the composing room unnoticed by the editor, who must have known, had it come to his notice that it was wrong in several particulars.

We notice, however, that a correction was made in last night's issue.

While it is true that an old log, or wooden pipe is buried beneath Salem's thoroughfares, that once conveyed water from Peabody, to that city, the log has not been used for perhaps fifty years. Two iron pipes supply what water flows from the works of that town—one 12 inches and the other 16 inches, the larger being the last laid by the old Salem and South Danvers Aqueduct company, was put down as early as 1865, and we are informed that no use was made of the log after laying the first iron pipe several years before.

The article is also wrong in stating that the water comes from Bartholemew's Pond. No water has ever been taken from that pond either by the old company or the town, the water being unfit for general purposes. Bartholemew's Pond lies in the south westerly part of the town, surrounded by thick woods, a retreat only of gunners and lovers of nature. The pond whence the supply is actually drawn, is Spring Pond, a beautiful sheet of water lying to the eastward of Lynn street. Formerly a series of stone cisterns, ranging between Spring Pond and what is known as the fountain, on the edge of Cedar Grove cemetery, were used as a source of supply, they being fed by springs. Later, the basin which forms the fountain referred to, was dammed up and water was drawn from there, but some years ago, to ensure a constant supply of pure water at all seasons, the supply pipe was extended to about the centre of Spring Pond, and it is from this source that the water starts on its journey to the Naumkeag mills.

Until about three years ago water was also supplied by the Water Department of this town, which is the successor of the Aqueduct company, to the Boston & Maine railroad company, for their "round house" at Salem. But differences between the superintendent who was in charge at that time, and Gen. Manager Furber, prevented a renewal of that contract, and the mills are now the only takers of Peabody water in Salem. To them the supply is almost invaluable, on account of its purity, and it is understood that the railroad company were rather reluctant to make a change, as there is no other water supply in the state that is so good for steam boilers.

ESSEX COUNTY.

All the cars of the Essex Electric road that could be run on the road without interference, were in motion on the Fourth. Being a single track line and not having a sufficient number of turnouts, it was impossible to run all the rolling stock. Five electric cars were in operation and stood up finely all day, not a break or any kind of accident occurring.

City Marshal John W. Hart was elected Lieut. Col. of the Second Corps of Cadets, on Monday evening to succeed Lieut. Col. J. Frank Dalton resigned.

Rev. J. M. Leonard of Wesley Church will take his vacation in July and Rev. G. A. Phinney will look after both churches. In August Mr. Phinney takes his vacation and Mr. Leonard will take charge of the two societies.

The County Treasurer's receipts to June 30, 1891, were $247,832.34 and the county expenditures to the same date were $217,735.74.

The steamer Watertown is hereafter to be used exclusively for passenger business. Trips from Salem to Nantasket beach have been suggested. The Salem Cadet Band played at the beach on Sunday.

Robert W. Woodward, of Boston, electrician of the New England Telephone Co., while using a knife on the Salem exchange on Friday afternoon cut a bed gash in his leg. Dr. Symonds took four stitches to close the cut.

Deposits made in the Salem Savings Bank on or before Wednesday next July 15, will go on interest at that date.

The annual picnic for the poor children of Salem, provided for by the Reed fund, was held at the Willows yesterday.

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Mr. Gilman Low was shot by R. M. Brown of Beverly at the picnic at Centennial Grove on Saturday. It seems that Brown went up to the target, took up a gun and fired it into the soda fountain house. The gun was taken away from him, but he wanted to finish out the string and he was cautioned to be more careful. He promised and took the gun the second time, aiming for the target, but quicker than a flash he turned and fired at Gilman, the shot going through his shoulder and grazing the bone. He was arrested but his brother settled the matter.—Salem Gazette.

The Essex County Prohibition club will hold its next quarterly meeting in Hope chapel, Salisbury Beach, on Wednesday, July 22.

Rev. S. C. Beane of Newburyport will be one of the speakers at the Unitarian grove meeting at The Weirs, N. H., July 25 to Aug. 3.

Patrick H. Collins on Tuesday afternoon rescued John Maguire, nine years of age, from drowning in North River, Salem. Maguire fell from the rail of a schooner, and had sunk twice, when Mr. Collins succeeded in reaching him and pulling him out. The lad lives on Franklin street.

Interest in the Sunday evening services at the First Congregational church, Rockport, has increased greatly since Rev. Israel Ainsworth began to hold them in the church instead of in the vestry.

A basket of clothes was stolen from a Rantoul-street residence in Beverly on Tuesday in broad daylight. A team drove up and the basket was lifted into the wagon and carried away. A hitch in the telephone prevented the capture of the thief.

At Newburyport on Tuesday Mrs. Siney of the Eagle House was fined $100 for violation of the license law, which she paid; and Thos. M. Whiting was held in $500 on the charge of perjury. He swore the seized liquor belonged to him.

The Boards of Trade of Amesbury and Newburyport have arranged for the annual picnic, to take place at Salisbury Beach July 16.

William H. Downes of Salem met with a serious accident at a Lynn shoe factory Thursday. His hand was terribly mangled, one finger being cut off and another being badly cut. He caught the member in a machine. He was taken to the Lynn hospital and afterwards removed to his home on Symonds street, Salem.

The Lynn police have broken all previous records on the number of arrests. They had at the station Sunday evening 78 prisoners and 38 were let out on probation.

Death of Hon. Hannibal Hamlin.

Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, who was the oldest surviving vice president of the United States, died at Bangor, on Saturday last, the nation's birthday, at the advanced age of 81 years, 10 months, 23 days.

Early in the afternoon it was known that he was stricken with paralysis, and the usual noisy festivities ceased. About 3 o'clock in the afternoon Mr. Hamlin went in the pouring rain to the club house on Main street, where it was his custom to pass away the time at "Pedro." He was engaged in a game when suddenly he complained of severe pains in the back. An hour later, at 5 o'clock, he fell forward upon the table, and his wife was sent for and his physician summoned. Stimulants were applied, and he revived sufficiently to recognize his wife when she arrived, and some minutes later muttered a few words of greeting. Sometime later he spoke to members of his family, but at 8.15 he fell back and expired. His son, H. E. Hamlin, arrived a few minutes too late to see his father alive and was greatly affected by the shock.

The last public appearance of Mr. Hamlin was June 20, when he spoke before the full bench of the Supreme Court of Maine, at the exercises in memory of late Chief Justice Appleton, his life long friend.

The funeral took place Thursday, when the city was draped in mourning in respect to his memory.

The Salem Gazette on Capitalization.

"We must, with a spirit becoming the magnitude of the occasion, resent Mr. Molt's imputation that the Gazette does not allow its readers (or its writers) to supply their own 'caps.' We may be just a shade particular on the subject of punctuation and paragraphing; but on the 'capital letter' question, we confess that the more we study the less we know, and have long since surrendered to the 'go as you please' system. We tried the plan of making a sharp division on common and proper names, and beginning every common name with a small letter. But in practice it did seem as if the President of the United States were entitled to a more emphatic letter than a president of a base ball or gambling club. And then if the President should be allowed a capital, what is the word 'presidential' entitled to? And so when we spoke of the righteous Republicans (which is our side) or the wicked Democrats (who are the other fellows) it seemed as if a larger letter were required than is used in speaking of republicans and democrats in the general sense of those words. No; we have never made one rule last three weeks on the capital letter question, shall and therefore not deprive ourselves of a vacation in order to keep an eye upon that particular department of the Gazette. We run the capital letter business very much as Lord Timothy Dexter did his punctuation, when he inserted two pages of punctuation marks at the end of his book with an invitation to the reader to put them into the main body of the work according to taste."

DANA'S ABSOLUTELY CURES DISEASE!

The logic of the Herald's argument, in discussing the Maine liquor law, is invisible when it says that "The desire of the Maine hotel keepers to do a business openly which they are now obliged to carry on in a closet is something that ought to command the approval of the clergy as well as of the press." To be more exact, the clergy ought to approve of the desire of men to do a business legally which they are determined to do illegally, anyhow. There is nothing that compels a Maine landlord to sell rum beyond his own desire to do so. Of course it is impossible to run a hotel successfully without an alcoholic auxiliary, but if the Maine hotel keeper is anxious not to violate the law why does he not move out of the state and into a commonwealth where hypocrisy is not so permeating? The Herald's holier-than-thou editor evidently has a wicked partner to whom he confides the prohibition question.—Charlestown Enterprise.

How We Spent the Fourth.

The glorious Fourth has made one more period in the progress of time. Hundreds have shared the fate that has been so common in years past, and helped to swell the columns of accidents in the daily papers. The records of Police courts have been blistered by criminal prosecutions such as are accounted regular concomitants of the occasion, but we are pleased to write a diminution in numbers in several localities.

Thousands on the other hand have enjoyed a holiday and perhaps been benefited by the opportunity to breathe the fresh air and rest from weary toil that makes up the larger part of human existence.

In this vicinity there was but little of the old time spirit of celebration, apart from the noise of frequently exploding crackers or the desultory blast of tin horns. In Peabody an air of quiet reigned that out Sundayed Sunday, except for a brief interval before departure or after return of our town's people from visits to neighboring cities. In Salem there was no particular programme. The Cadet Band played on the common in the afternoon, while the crowd of humanity which thronged the avenue witnessed the bicycle races; and in the evening, illumination by electricity was made to take the place of the usual display of rockets and set pieces, the delight of the Electric light company and corresponding disappointment of the young people. Of course the regular bon fires that have been kindled for more than a century on the eve of the Fourth, were lighted on Gallows Hill and the Lookout, and a large gathering assembled at each of these places to see the blaze, listen to the music and have a good time. About 800 barrels and hogsheads were consumed at the Lookout and nearly as many were sacrificed on Witch Hill.

In Danvers a morning salute was fired but the heavy rain prevented the entire number of rounds being fired. A parade was arranged for 8 o'clock, this also was delayed by the rain, not starting until 10 o'clock. The parade was in three divisions and include the Grand Army, Military, Fire Department, Trades procession and bicycles. Many historical allegorical and burlesque features were displayed, and although some features were omitted on account of the weather it was a grand success. Hon. A. P. White was the orator of the day. He gave an interesting address. A horseshoe made in the procession was presented by him to Company K. as a talisman. In the evening a band concert, pyrotechnic display and stereopticon exhibition were provided.

At Manchester an entertainment was provided by the Seaside Athletic Club, consisting of athletic performances various races and concluded with a display of fireworks in the evening.

At Lynn the day was celebrated in the old style, with a big parade, and concerts, fireworks and all the etc. that belong to Fourth of July festivities. Many of the clubs kept open house and everybody was entertained in one way or another from sunrise till bed time.

Orgies in a Charnel House.

Portsmouth, N. H. has had quite a sensation this week caused by the discovery of beer barrels in the receiving tomb of the cemetery. Beer has been missed for some time and on Wednesday a lad noticed the tomb door open, where upon looking in he saw a beer barrel. His father on being told notified the police and a visit was made to the place which was found deserted and a fire that had been left burning was nearly burned out.

During the past three months it is estimated from $100 to $500 worth of beer has been stolen from the cars beside what was taken from and drank in the tomb, by tramps and hoodlums.

Portsmouth prides herself on her cemetery and to find the resting place of her honored dead, thus desecrated, has created no little indignation and excitement.

Schleimann No Dreamer.

He was a short man, slightly round-shouldered, dark complexion, with large, keen black eyes, and a black moustache, clipped short. He kept his hands in the pockets of his sack coat, and a cigar in his mouth. He wore black-bowed spectacles, a checked flannel shirt, and a black necktie. He was an unpretending man, quick motioned, and very social. The wonder was that he seemed to chat with people of many nationalities with equal ease. Once the theme of his conversation fell on my ear, and it was mining in the United States. Who was he? An operator in mining stocks? Hardly. A clergyman? Still less. A merchant? Not quite. A schoolmaster abroad? This, on the whole, seemed the most probable. The truth was, as I soon found, he was Dr. Heinrich Schleimann.—New England Magazine.

An amateur gardener at Belfast, Me., planted his poles all right, but forgot to plant his beans.

LOCAL LINES.

Mr. & Mrs. Albert Fifield are at the Russell Cottage, North Conway, N. H.

Mrs. A. A. Abbott, Edward W. Abbott and William S. Abbott are at Franklin Falls, N. H.

Mr. and Mrs. Jacob C. Rogers of Oak Hill will sail for Europe next week, where they will pass the summer.

About 35 of Union Post G. A. R. will visit Detroit during the national encampment. The round trip will be $15.

Joseph F. Wiggin started on his official vacation Wednesday. He is the first of the letter carriers to rusticate. Arthur E. Jackman will substitute.

The Father Mathew Ladies' Aid Society held an ice cream sociable at the hall on Walnut street last night. It was a very enjoyable occasion.

A shepherd dog belonging to Mr. Carroll was struck by a street car one day this week and injured quite severely. Police Officer Sweeney killed the animal to end his sufferings.

The plant of the Franklin Electric company has been removed to Bridgeport, Conn. The company will surrender the factory to Mr. Craig on the first of August. Several parties from out of town have been looking at the premises with a view to locating.

John Maloney's horse, while attached to his fruit wagon, became frightened and ran. Clearing himself from the wagon he took to the sidewalk and was captured in front of B. F. Stevens' store by Thomas H. O'Keefe, the teamster.

E. & C. Woodman at their greenhouses, Danvers, are offering some splendid bargains in flowering plants. A visit to their establishment is a real treat, suggesting the Elysian fields, by the quantity and variety of the plants. Now is the time to set out celery and cauliflower plants, they have them for sale at very low prices.

Mrs. Dr. Charles G. Weston, formerly of Peabody, has been visiting friends in town during this week. She speaks in the highest terms of their adopted home in Minneapolis, and reports the doctor's health very much improved by the change of climate. Rumors that the doctor was dissatisfied with the west, she says, are unfounded. On the contrary he is much attached to this new home.

The members of the South parish held their annual picnic at Centennial Grove, on Thursday. About 175 attended it, ranging in age from 20 months, to 84 years. The morning was cloudy, but the day proved to be one of the best, and a very pleasant time was enjoyed. The superintendent of the Grove this season is Mr. George D. Tracey, a former resident of Peabody, and well fitted for the office.

The Selectmen have passed resolutions protesting against such joint expense as the Common Council of Salem have urged regarding a division of the expense of constructing the new Harmony Grove road as being unusual, unjust, unnecessary and wholly contrary to the understanding under which the case has been heard before the county commissioners, and under which the town of Peabody has voted in favor of said road and obtained legislative action enabling them to appropriate money to aid in its construction.

The Helena Independent says:—talking of new conductors recalls a story told by Supt. Cahill, of the steam motor line. Some two or three weeks ago Cahill employed a young fellow as conductor. He was inexperienced in that branch of the business, but was a willing chap, who showed a disposition to obey orders. After having him run a couple of days with an old conductor he was given a run.

On his first day Cahill was riding up from the depot with him. When on Eighth avenue two ladies in the car signalled; the new conductor was not looking, but Cahill was and the latter pulled the bell cord. The car stopped in the middle of the block, where the mud was ankle deep. The ladies, after looking out of the window, concluded to alight at the corner, and so indicated. By this time the new conductor was aware something was up, and, not having seen Cahill pull the bell cord, inquired what the trouble was. I stopped it, said the superintendent, but I guess you had better run to the next corner, where the crossing is. No sooner were the words spoken than splash! the new conductor jumped out into the mud and ran to the corner. The train was started off again, but the willing conductor outran it to the crossing, where he gallantly assisted the ladies to alight. He never questions his instructions, says Cahill in telling the story, but what he thought he was going to do when he arrived at the corner, I cannot guess.

The Superintendent referred to is Chris Cahill a brother of John J. Cahill the U. S. Mail Agent of this town.

NOTED AND QUOTED.

Let us be fair. Gov. Russell would have done much better for himself if he renominated Mr Crocker for railroad commissioner. As its chairman for three years, he has administered its affairs, and performed such public services as was demanded of him in a way to make him popular with large classes of men. But Gov. Russell has re-appointed a large number of republicans to office, although the democrats have never been permitted to participate extensively in state patronage since the republicans have held the commonwealth.—Boston Transcript.

New Orleans, it is said, celebrated the Fourth of July with more fervor than has been shown there since Louisiana seceded. Was there any relation of cause and effect between that fact and the massacre of the Italians a few months before?

It is said that turned wooden lasts, which in this country cost about $1 25 a pair, and the same in England, are made in Germany and laid down in England for one fifth of that sum. Rather a large difference, considering that the English last makers have gone out of business.

Emerson on Creeds.

There is hardly a reform or proposal of reform, belonging to the second and third quarters of our century, that is not touched upon in these pages, and is not illuminated or made interesting by his characteristic method of treatment. Religion itself, in his apprehension of it, came to be closely allied to reform. No longer did religion, he said, tend to cult, but to a heroic life. It was hard, he thought, to conceive church, any liturgy, any rite, that would be quite genuine; but all things urged leading a man's life.—New England Magazine.

DANA'S SARSAPARILLA CURES!

Why, asked the lady of the house of Bootless Bob, the tramp, do you stick out the middle finger of your left hand so straight when you eat? Was it ever broken? No, madam, but during my halcyon days I wore a diamond ring on that finger, and it has become second nature with me.

Kingley (visiting Bingo)—I like to come over to your house (puff) because I always (puff) feel such absolute freedom about smoking. My wife (puff) makes such a fuss about it. I don't suppose it makes the slightest difference to your wife, does it? Bingo (placidly)—No, not so long (puff) as I have a guest.

Round Tables Becoming Popular.

Round tables are becoming more and more established in fashionable favor as the proper shape for the dinner board. For some time the small round ones have been used at supper parties, and now the English social season is emphasizing the use of the dinner size. It is an old fashion revived, and artistic dinner givers will welcome it. A table can be so prettily laid when all the covers radiate from a common center. The circular boards are decidedly more sociable too. Just as changing a company from one room to another disturbs and chills social warmth, so turning a corner at the table splits the unanimity of the circle, divides the diners into groups, and the amalgamation of talk is prevented.

The change, too, will be a welcome one to frequent dinner givers, who of late find their ingenuity taxed to devise novel floral arrangements. A round table at once demands quite a different "laying" from an extension board.—New York Times.

Clever London Girls.

Two or three ladies who live in a suburb of London have started a sort of little carrier pigeon club among themselves. They have each a couple of these pretty messengers and send notes to each other irrespective of the post or telegraph office. They say that the convenience of the plan is great, as they can arrange impromptu tea parties and can collect each other for tennis with no trouble.

A Country without Shoe Factories.

Strange as it may appear to a foreigner, it is nevertheless true that in Mexico with some 11,000,000 people, 5,000,000 of whom are supposed to wear shoes, the manufacture of this article on a wholesale plan is as yet comparatively unknown. That such an enterprise as the making of first grade boots and shoes in Mexico would place most remunerative profits into the pocket of the pioneer, there can be no reasonable shadow of a doubt. As in olden times, shoemaking in Mexico is a pure handicraft, and the modern machinery employed in the extensive factories of the United States has yet to take the place of the primitive method. Owing to the very inferior grade of work turned out by the native shoemaker, the majority of the American population of the republic purchase their shoes of the real dealers in the United States, and have them sent by mail to their respective destinations. Owing to the high tariff and the fluctuating price of the Mexican silver coin in the American money markets, the shoes that in the United States commonly retail for $7, reach Mexico costing their owners from $11 to $13 Mexican currency. But the consumer most willingly pays this rather exorbitant price in preference to expending $6 for the loosely made and thoroughly unreliable article made there. Aside from the fact that the Mexican shoe is made from very indifferent material, and consequently short-lived, to secure in a native establishment what in American shoe parlance is geographically termed as a good fit, is a physical impossibility. The Mexican foot is small, and closely assimilated to the Grecian foot with the long, slender toe, and therefore the majority of the shoes worn are of the most pronounced tooth-pick order, and hence not in much favor with the general run of Americans, who prefer the wide toe and the broad heel Waukenphast, with its accompanying comfort, to the pain-producing article of Mexican make.—The Shoe.

REMARKABLE FACTS.

Heart disease is supposed to be incurable, but when properly treated a large proportion of cases can be cured. Thus Mrs. Elmira Hatch, of Elkhart, Ind., and Mrs. Mary L. Baker, of Ovid, Mich., were cured after suffering 20 years. S. C. Linburger, druggist at San Jose, Ill., says that Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure, which cured the former, "worked wonders for his wife." Levi Logan, of Buchanan, Mich., who had heart disease for 30 years, says two bottles made him feel like a new man. Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure is sold by Wm. T. Lee. Book of wonderful testimonials free.

A Universal Beverage.

While coffee (Coffea arabica) now figures as one of the most considerable economic products, its use as an article of food in civilized countries is of comparatively recent origin. In Abyssinia and Ethiopia, where the coffee-plant is indigenous, the people have been accustomed to decoctions from its berries from time immemorial. There the Arabs first tasted the fragrant draught; and, highly delighted therewith, transported some of the precious beans to their own country about the beginning of the fifteenth century. In Arabia the new exotic flourished luxuriantly, and, strangely enough, entered into the occasions of religious controversy. Legend reports that a devout Moslem, who had heard of the wakeful effect produced upon browsing goats by its foliage, resolved to try what influence a brewing from its berries might have upon the somnolent dervishes who nonchalantly fell asleep during protracted services. The result was cal. Drowsy laymen followed their example. Coffee became the national beverage of the faithful. Mohammedan pilgrims to Mecca carried beans to all lands whence they had come. Egypt soon rejoiced in coffee-houses, and in Constantinople (A. D. 1554) they acquired constant popularity. Mosques were overshadowed by them. Quickened wits of drinkers suggested intoxication to the religious, and political insubordination to the authorities. The former denounced the dangerous resorts and the latter shut them up. But the beverage triumphed. Prohibition did not prohibit.

In Cairo (1523) the Governor gravely listened to all the erudite arguments against coffee, served it out to the rancorous opponents, and left his seat without saying a word. He was wise. The masterful drink stopped discussion forever. In 1652 coffee entered England from Smyrna, whence it was brought by Edwards, an English merchant doing business with Turkey. He was wont to regale his friends with the delicious liquid, prepared by the skilful hands of Pasqua Rossie, his Greek servant. But visitors increased too numerous. Hospitality became burdensome. Peace and pocket cried out for relief. Edwards established his man in a coffee-house at Newman's Court, Cornhill, London.

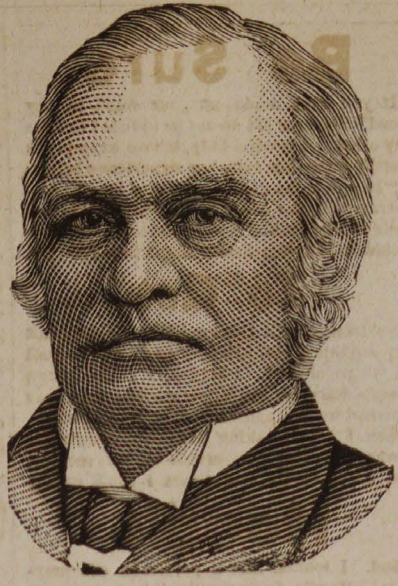

Twenty-three years after this event coffee-houses were the favorite haunts of wits and politicians "for discussing, theorizing, and general wagging of tongue." Coffee and criticism were cronies. Therefore the phosphorescent Charles II and his courtiers, wincing under the "slanderous attacks upon persons in high stations," would fain have suppressed coffee houses as hot beds of seditious talk and public nuisances. They failed to do so. The revolution of 1688 followed. The victorious institution survived the Stuart dynasty, and attained the zenith of activity and splendor the first half of the next century.

Thevenot, the French traveller, on his return from the Orient in 1688, treated his guests to after dinner coffee. To Parisians this was merely an eccentricity, that would not have become fashionable but for the example set by Soliman Aga, the gallant Turkish ambassador, in 1669. He enlisted the favor of court ladies in favor of the black and bitter liquor. Philosophers and literati gladly gave it their adhesion. Boileau, La Fontaine, Moliere, Voltaire, and the Encyclopedists, together with the chess players found inspiration in the coffee-houses, which thenceforward assumed conspicuous position in social life in Gallic cities. "Racine and coffee will pass," is a prediction of Madame de Sevigne as yet mostly unlikely of fulfillment.

Germans began drinking coffee during the Seven Years' War (1756-63) stolidly scoffed at opposition to the practice, and hated Napoleon all the more by restricting it by his Continental Blockade. Universal peace was accompanied by universal indulgence in the exhilarating cup. Americans took kindly to its contents, and by constantly enlarging demand imparted powerful impetus to coffee culture and commerce. Rise in prices during the great civil war diminished the consumption about two hundred thousand tons. But for that, it is asserted that "the world would not have had coffee enough." Demand arose with every Union victory, and fell with every Union defeat. Consumption increased 36.84 per cent. in 1864, 17.5 per cent. in 1865, 23.5 per cent. in 1866, and 27.25 per cent. in 1867. Removal of duties and financial prosperity increased the call for the aromatic berry, and advance in price because of short crops or syndicate operations diminished it. The coffee cup is a business thermometer in the United States.—Harper's Weekly.

HON. J. J. C. ABBOTT.

The New Canadian Premier.

The crisis in Canadian affairs which followed Sir John Macdonald's death has reached an end, through the appointment of Senator John Joseph Caldwell Abbott as his successor. The new Premier was born 70 years ago, at St. Andrews, Quebec. His father, the rector of St. Andrews, prepared the son for McGill College, where he was graduated in 1845. Two years later he was called to the bar. As a lawyer Abbott became a leading authority in commercial law. In 1859 he was elected as representative of his native county in the Assembly of United Canada, and held this position until the union in 1867, when he became a member, representing the same district, of the Dominion Parliament. He was Solicitor-General in 1862 in the cabinet of Sir John Macdonald, but resigned some time ago. Leaving the cabinet, Mr. Abbott prepared and procured the passage of the Insolvency act of 1864, the basis of the present Dominion bankruptcy laws. In 1880 he reentered Parliament, and seven years later he became a member of the cabinet as a minister without a portfolio. Having been one of Sir John Macdonald's most trusted advisers, his appointment to the Premiership gives great satisfaction to the western provinces, Ontario and the Maritime provinces. Quebec was strongly in favor of the appointment of Sir John Thompson. For the present, at least, he will follow the footprints of his predecessor.

The Presence of Fame.

The presence of fame is very infrequent. The village gazes in wonder at the return of the famous man who was born on the farm on the hill, and whose latent greatness nobody suspected; while the youth who printed verses in the corner of the county paper, and drew the fascinated glances of palpitating maidens in the meeting house, and seemed to the farmers to have associated himself at once with Shakespeare and Tupper and the great literary or "littery" folk, never emerges from the poet's department in the paper in which unconsciously and forever he has been cornered. It would be a grim Puritan jest if that department had been named from the corner of the famous dead in Westminster Abbey.—Harper's Magazine.

A NATIONAL EVENT.

The holding of the World's Fair in a city scarcely fifty years old will be a remarkable event, but whether it will really benefit this nation as much as the discovery of the Restorative Nerve by Dr. Franklin Miles is doubtful. This is just what the American people need to cure their excessive nervousness, dyspepsia, headache, dizziness, sleeplessness, neuralgia, nervous debility, dullness, confusion of mind, etc. It acts like a charm. Trial bottles and fine book on "Nervous and Heart Diseases," with unequalled testimonials, free at Wm. T. Lee's. It is warranted to contain no opium, morphine or dangerous drugs.

Purveyor—What is this I hear? Going to compound with your creditors? A pretty state of things! Merchant—Now, pray be calm, you shall lose nothing by me. I can only give my other creditors 30 per cent., but you shall have your goods returned—they are still intact. What! My goods? What are you thinking of? Not for Joseph! I insist upon having my 30 per cent.

She—This is my little pet alligator, who has been fasting for months. He—Why does not some one give him the tip that Lent is over?

Once upon a time, said Marshal P. Wilder to a group of interested Englishmen in his hotel, a little colored boy sat at a table pounding his thumb nail with a hammer, and the famous story teller screwed his face in comical grimaces expressive of recurring pain while his hands went through the motions suggested by the story. Presently, he continued, a man asked him what he was doing that for. Cause, whimpered the boy, it feels so good when I stop.

Do you see that pale young man calling out "Cash!" at the ribbon counter? Yes. Fate's awful funny sometimes. Ten years ago, when we were boys together, his one ambition was to be a mighty hunter and catch mountain lions with a lasso.

Are You Single?

Young Man: Perhaps you have in your mind's eye, a young lady of estimable qualities, kind, loving, and confiding.

Perhaps you are very desirous of marrying her, but half afraid to broach the subject because your bank account is slim, and you are anxious to settle her in a nicely furnished home.

Have you any idea of the cost? Well, 'tis not so much as you imagine, if you deal with us. We can save you fifty, seventy-five, maybe a hundred dollars! And we can help you out in paying for it besides. Suppose you get our figures, according to "Atkinson's Adjustable Plans," and our easy terms. It may smooth the way for accomplishing your heart's desire. We will be glad to hear your proposition of how much you can pay Propose to-day. every month.

The Sandpiper.

BY CELIA THAXTER.

Across the narrow beach we flit,
One little sandpiper and I,
And fast I gather, bit by bit,
The scattered driftwood bleached and dry,
The wild waves reach their hands for it,
The wild wind raves, the tide runs high,
As up and down the beach we flit,
One little sandpiper and I.

Above our heads the sullen clouds
Send back and swift across the sky;
Like silent ghosts in misty shrouds
Stand out the white lighthouses high.
Almost as far as eye can reach,
I see the close-reefed vessels fly,
As fast we flit along the beach,—
One little sandpiper and I.

I watch him as he skims along,
Uttering his sweet and mournful cry.
He starts not at my fitful song,
Or flash of fluttering drapery,
He has no thought of any wrong;
He scans me with a fearless eye.
Staunch friends are we, well tried and strong
The little sandpiper and I.

Comrade, where wilt thou be to-night,
When the loosed storm breaks furiously?
My driftwood fire will burn so bright!
To what warm shelter canst thou fly?
I do not fear for thee, though wroth
The tempest rushes through the sky;
For are we not God's children both,
Thou, little sandpiper, and I?

THE FARM AND GARDEN.

Dust baths should also be provided for the weaned chicks, and if any one of them are observed to look droopy and listless, examine them and see if they are not infested with vermin. If this be the case apply the proper remedies at once. Some sort of gritty material should also be provided them, and, if possible, ground bone. As the chicks grow older, three meals a day are sufficient for them, and I usually continue to feed them in their coops until the aperture for the entrance of the chicks is large enough to admit grown fowls, after which all the flock eat together.

A careful consideration of the wants of the weaned chicks pays exceedingly well, for thus is insured for the table an abundant supply of plump, juicy broilers, and the spring pullets, are induced to develop into early fall layers at the time the adult hens are moulting and eggs are consequently very scarce.—Country Gentlemen.

If one wants plenty of fresh eggs from his hens in winter, they must not only have warm shelter, but plenty of nutritious food from which to produce the eggs.—Poultry World.

From observations of the effects of cutting off the forests in Michigan and draining the land with surface ditches and tile drains, and from experiments with reference to the proclamation of water through soils, the following conclusions were reached at the experimental station of Michigan Agricultural college.

First—Surface ditching in connection with deforesting may increase floods and contribute to drought.

Second—The drainage may increase flood at the "break up" in spring when the water accumulated in the surface soil by the joint action of frost and soil capillarity during the winter and the surface accumulations in the form of snow are suddenly set free by a rapid thaw.

Third—During the warm months tile draining tends to mitigate flood by taking up the excessive rainfall and holding it in a capillary form, keeping back the sudden flow that would pass over the surface of the soil, if not absorbed by it, and escape by flood, and mitigating summer drought by increased capacity of the soil to hold water in capillary form, and to draw upon the subsoil water by reason of the increased capillary power of such soil produced by the draining.

In many of the older regions of the country of practice of plowing in "lands" is still very common. It is a waste of time, labor and land to follow this custom if the farm is properly drained. In low-lying fields the "land" may serve as a surface drain, but it should only be a temporary substitute for tile or other sub-surface drainage. In the course of time the extra labor demanded in ploughing and cultivating in small lands would be as much as required to put in a substantial and much more effective drain.

It is not generally known that there is one measurement in cattle which is a key to all other measurements. This is the length of the head, which in a well-proportioned animal is the same as each of the following: The distance between the hips from center to center, from center to hip bone to edge of flank, from center of hip bone to center of rump bone, from point of hock to the ground, and from dew lap to the ground. A well-grown Shorthorn three-year-old is, as a rule, about 22 inches in these respective measurements.

We have before suggested to planters of small fruits the advisability of paying more attention to the cultivation of currants. We are rather slow about recommending new varieties of fruits until they have stood the test of years, but all the evidence seems to point toward Fay's Prolific as the best and most productive of all currants. A writer in Garden and Forest says that he has picked 84 quarts from 12 bushes. An acre will contain about 1700 plants, and at this rate the ground could hardly be put to a more profitable use.

After getting rid of the idea that a hog must be fed through two winters in order to make it marketable, let us take up and study the matter of feeding in small lots. The heaviest weights are made on the least food in the shortest time, when small numbers are fed together, and the animals fed together should be as nearly of one age and size as possible. Then there will be an even distribution of the food given, and the herd will grow along at the same rate. In small lots, also, the hogs keep cleaner and quieter, and are less liable to disease. Where large numbers are kept upon one farm it would pay to have separate pastures, sheds and feeding pens.

In breeding horses we have gotten up to the point pretty generally of selecting good sires, and now we must go to a step further and pay equal attention to selecting the dam. Breeding will be more or less unsatisfactory until we choose dams that can show as good pedigree as the sires. We can not expect a full blood sire to produce a colt after his own style and finish when the mare has the blood of generations of mongrels running through her veins. In breeding milch cows we pay equal attention to the line from which each parent is derived. Even in hog-raising we look almost as much at the "points" of the sow as at those of the boar; but in raising the most valuable of all we seem to think that anything will do for the dam as long as we have a good size. Consequently any old broken down mare is considered "good enough to raise a colt."

Bee-keeping should have more attention from farmers. In locating the apiary select some cool, shady, quiet spot. The hives should never be placed against the side of a building, or close to a fence, but there should always be room to stand upon either side of them while working. The south side of a building is also an objectionable place, because it is liable—from the intense reflected heat of the sun—to give them the swarming fever. Also avoid placing the bees where cattle or horses constantly pass, as the overturning of a hive by the animals might produce serious results. The orchard is a good place for the bees, or an apiary and vineyard may be combined by placing the hives at good distances apart and planting a grape vine beside each. Do not fear that the bees will spoil the fruit, for it is a well-settled fact that they will not puncture a grape in order to get at its juices, but will only feed upon it after the birds have first taken a bite. Bees are not at all destructive, and they are especially valuable because they gather up and store away that which would be wholly lost if it were not that they can utilize it.

The reason why the silo provoked so much opposition and made so many enemies at first was because the methods of keeping silage were not well understood, and too much unnecessary work was done, and that without producing good results. Farmers took too much pains and did more than was needed. Heavy weighting, for instance, which is now known to be rather a disadvantage, was considered most important. The silage for some distance down under the heavy weight was usually spoiled, because the weight, being solid and not porous, would retain the heated and moist air which rises as soon as fermentation begins. The too close packing, which was also practiced, proved to be a great mistake, as it prevented fermentation by partially excluding the air. Fermentation should be allowed to begin, then keep the top of the silage covered with a foot of dry straw, and the air will all be expelled through it. If air is kept out of the sides and corners not enough fermentation can occur to make sound silage. A well filled silo will be among the best preparations you can make for good times this winter.

The Illinois Station gives the following as some results of last season's experiments in corn culture: The medium maturing sorts, such as Leaning and white varieties of similar season, gave a higher yield, without exception, than those maturing either earlier or later. Planting at one inch in depth gave larger crops on the average than deeper planting. (The result in this respect will, however, depend much upon whether the season, at the beginning, is wet or dry. If very dry, deeper covering would be found beneficial.) Better results were obtained from planting in hills than in drills, probably because in hill culture the corn could be kept cleaner. No practical benefit was derived from the use of commercial fertilizers. The increased yields from the use of stable manure probably repaid the cost of the application, and left some profit. To derive any knowledge of practical value from the last portion of this statement, we should know something of the nature of the land. If new, rich land, commercial fertilizers would perhaps have an appreciable benefit upon the corn crop, but if the land had been long in cultivation certain elements could be supplied to advantage, and would be almost sure to produce some good result, but whether enough to justify the added expense would be an open question.

Our Canadian neighbors are in advance of us in some particulars, and there is one thing at least to which we can call attention in which we might do well to follow their lead. In Ontario agriculture is taught in the common schools, just as are grammar, mathematics and geography. The "first principals of agriculture," which are taught, relate to definitions and explanations and embrace: The plant, soil, tillage, improvement of soils, preparation of soil for seed, rotation of crops, crops of the farm, growth and management, needs of the farm, diseases of crops, insects, outlines of the principals of feeding, care and management of horses, cattle and sheep, breeds of live stock, dairying, silo and ensilage the cultivation of forest trees, &c. It might be a good thing for the Farmer's Alliance to turn its attention this way, and use its influence to have such instruction introduced in our own schools.

Take Warning.

And don't let the germs of that vile disease, Catarrh, take root and flourish in your system. Sulphur Bitters will prevent this and will make you strong and healthy.—Editor Weekly Press.

Who Are the Canadians?

There is much nonsense written about the Canadian distinctive national type (I am not now alluding to the French Canadians) as different from the American. As a matter of fact, only a person gifted with microscopic powers of observation can discover any essential differences between Canadians, in the English-speaking progressive provinces, and American—that is, dissimilarities which are not equally marked between the inhabitants of different sections of the country. There is not, for instance, the striking contrast that exists between the people of Massachusetts and Virginia. It is worthy of remark also, that there is more in common between an average Canadian from the East or West, and an average American hailing from the same quarter, than there is between a Londoner and a genuine Yorkshireman or Cornishman, as the former do speak the same tongue, and the latter do not. A genuine Yorkshire farmer in London is to all intents and purposes a foreigner.—New England Magazine.

The Radical Emerson.

The essence of reform sentiment has rarely been better stated than in these words of Emerson's: The history of reform is always identical; it is the comparison of the idea with the fact. Ethics pledges us to the reform side. If we take our stand on necessity, we shall go for the conservative, he says; if on ethics, for the reformer. The inspiration of such a view is the thought that human nature is not the measuring thing we ordinarily take it to be; the conviction that there is an infinite worthiness in man which will appear at the call of worth. All particular reforms are but the removing of some impediment. For we must see, that the world not only fits the former men, but fits us, to clear ourselves of every usage which has not its roots in our own mind. What is man borne for but to be a Re-former, a re-maker of what man has made. . . . imitating that great nature which embodies us all, and which sleeps no moment in an old past, but every hour repares herself, yielding us every morning a new day, and with every pulsation a new life? Hence ancient institutions should not have too much respect. New England Magazine.

Invalid Wife—I'll have to die, George, goodbye! Husband—Oh, don't Liza. Think of another woman to be brought in over your children! Invalid Wife—I'll get well if it kills me!

Doctor—Well how do you feel today? Patient—I feel as if I had been dead a week. Doctor—Hot—Eh?

Merchant—We will pay you three dollars a week if you think you can do the work. Young America—All right, boss. Draw up de contract an I'll sign wid your club.

Proprietor [angrily]—How does it happen, sir, that in all this rush you have not made a sale this week?

Calico Clerk [repentantly]—It was all owing to looking after your interest, sir. "Nonsense!" "It's true, sir. Every old lady, young lady and schoolgirl who came to my counter asked if our calico would fade, and I swore up and down they wouldn't." "Well?" "Well, I've just found out they wanted the stuff to color Easter eggs."

A YEAR! I undertake to briefly teach any fairly intelligent person of either sex, who can read and write, and who, after instruction, will work industriously, how to earn Three Thousand Dollars a Year in their own locality, wherever they live. I will also furnish them with the necessary capital to start on their own account. No money for me unless successful as above. Easily and quickly learned. I desire but one worker from each district or county. I have already taught and provided with employment a large number, who are making over $3000 a year each. It's NEW and SOLID. Full particulars FREE. Address at once, E. C. ALLEN, Box 420, Augusta, Maine.

If you insist upon breaking our engagement, Miss Fickle, I shall make your letters public. You are welcome to do so, Mr. Scamper; there is nothing in them that I am ashamed of except the address.

A candidate was being examined by four professors. Feeling extremely nervous his memory failed him several times. At last one of the professors, growing impatient, thundered out, Why, you cannot quote a single passage of Scripture correctly. Yes, I can! exclaimed the candidate. I just happened to remember a passage in the Revelation, And I lifted up my eyes and beheld four great beasts!

LITERARY NOTES.

A Phenomenal Success.

"Niobe," the merry American fantastic comedy, by Harry and Edward Poulton, authors of Ermine, is now in the fourth week of its wonderful record-breaking run at the Boston Museum. "Niobe," as presented by Abbott & Teal's Comedy Co., and under the personal stage direction of Ben Teal, has certainly caught the fancy of the play-going public.

Rarely in the history of local theatricals has a company achieved such an instantaneous triumph as in the case of "Niobe." The popular Boston Museum has been crowded at every performance, and those who cannot get in at one try at another, and still again and again after repeated failures to gain a foothold. The historic old playhouse resounds with laughter and applause, in which ladies and children join quite as heartily as their lords of the sterner sex, and a merrier spot of a Wednesday or Saturday afternoon when the little ones are brought out in such numbers it is difficult to imagine.

Mr. Field is a very successful manager, not having had in twenty-seven years a season resulting unsatisfactory. But public taste was never more thoroughly gratified and the good judgment of this excellent manager more heartily endorsed than in the present production of "Niobe" at the Boston Museum.

The Eighth Annual Bible Conference at Crescent Beach, Revere, Mass., will be held July 21st, 22nd, 23rd and 24th. This is the Northfield meeting for the study of the Bible and learning what it is, for Boston and vicinity and the parts beyond. The meetings are increasing in interest; the coming meeting bids fair to excel all others. The Bible is at present the subject of the severest criticism. It is not the Critics' book, it is the People's book and God's book, and so the Bible Conference will treat it. Among the speakers who will be present are Rev. Nathaniel West, D. D., Rev. O. P. Gifford, Rev. George C. Needham and Mrs. Needham, Evangelist W. S. Martin, Rev. E. H. Byington, D. D., Rev. Mr. Jameson, Russell Sturgis, Esq., Christian Endeavor speakers and others. Mrs. Bailey, who sang at the Moody meetings last winter in Boston, Rev. Robert True and Lawrence Greenwood, are expected to sing. Other distinguished speakers and singers will be present. Rev. Nathaniel West will be present at all the meetings and will speak every day on the Higher Criticism. A distinguished preacher says of Dr. West: "No living man is better qualified to speak on this subject." It will be well worth all the expense incident to attendance upon the Conference to hear these addresses. Sessions, 10 a. m., 2.30 and 7.30 p. m. Wednesday is especially adapted to members of Endeavor Societies. Crescent Beach can be reached by the Boston & Maine R. R. (Eastern Div.), by the Boston, Revere Beach & Lynn R. R. and by horse cars from Cornhill, Boston. For board and rooms address Mrs. C. L. Sanders. A great blessing is expected upon the Conference. Pray for it. For circulars, etc., address Rev. J. P. Bixby, Revere, Mass.

A double-page is devoted to pictures of the great Yale-Harvard race on the Thames, in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper this week. The fascinating story of the Leslie Alaska Expedition and its adventures is continued. A page is devoted to interesting foreign pictures, and there is also a page of views in Havana. The last is accompanied by a startling article by Frank A. Burr, a well-known journalist, on "The Destiny of Cuba—Annexation." A Kansas belle, a full-page view of an ocean steamer concert, and many other pictures make up the number. Printed in English and German. Price, ten cents. Get it of your newsdealer, or send $1 to 110 Fifth Avenue, New York, for a three months' trial subscription.

The third book in the series of Harper's School Speakers, edited by James Baldwin, Ph.D., is announced as nearly ready for publication.

The most complete history of the Chilian war yet published in this country appears in Harper's Weekly published July 8th. The illustrations include views of prominent localities connected with the war, pictures of Chilian warships, and portraits of the leading men on both sides of the conflict.

A "Roll of Honor" is published in this week's number of Harper's Weekly, embracing the names of the winners this year of the "American Victoria Cross." Portraits and an account of the manner in which the distinction was won will accompany the list.

A new serial by Thomas Hardy, entitled "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," has just begun in Harper's Bazar, with illustrations by H. Herkomer.

The first book to be published by Harper & Brothers under the new copyright law is the life of The Right Honorable William E. Gladstone, by G. W. E. Russell. This is the fourth volume in the new series of political biographies entitled "The Queen's Prime Ministers," edited by Stuart J. Reid, of which the other three are devoted to Lord Beaconsfield, Sir Robert Peel and Viscount Melbourne. Being written from personal acquaintance with the career of Mr. Gladstone, the present volume may confidently be regarded as the most accurate and impartial biography of the great statesman that has yet been published.

The 8.30 A. M. express from Boston on the Fitchburg railroad, Wednesday morning, ran over and killed, near Belmont Crossing, one of two men who were walking on the track. From the superscription upon letters in his pocket the deceased is believed to have been G. S. Little, a plumber by trade, who has lived in Ohio, but has lately been in Boston, where he leaves a widow.

John Mathes, the oldest carpet dealer in St. Paul, Minn., assigned yesterday. The assets are placed at $100,000, and the liabilities at a small sum.

Jesse Alderman, one of the well-known citizens of Framingham Centre, died Tuesday at his home, at an advanced age, after an illness of a number of weeks. Some years ago the deceased was a broker in Boston.

A horrible railroad accident occurred on the New York, Lake Erie & Western road early last Friday morning. As a train was standing at Ravenna, Ohio, waiting for orders, a heavy freight came up behind, crashing into the rear, telescoping three cars. Nineteen passengers were killed and 38 wounded. After the collision the wreck caught fire, adding to the horrors of the scene. Many bodies were burned beyond recognition.

A terrible accident occurred on the Kanawa & Michigan road near Charlestown, West Va., about 10.30 o'clock Saturday morning. In this accident the victims were frightfully mutilated. The accident was caused by running off a trestle bridge.

A freight train and work train on the Omaha road collided near Mendota, Minnesota, on Thursday afternoon. The freight train was derailed and thirty of its cars destroyed by fire. The engine was also wrecked. Several of the trainmen jumped into the Mississippi river to escape death, and came ashore. It was reported that three trains were burned to death. The loss to the railroad in burned freight is figured at $50,000.

Hon. Rufus Livermore, who responded to Gov. Andrews' call for volunteers in 1861, and commanded Co. B, of the Mass. 6th, in the memorable Baltimore riot of April 6, died at Orange Thursday morning. He has been associated with the Rodney Hunt Company as secretary and director since the war. His age was 52 years. He was a member of Post 17 G. A. R. He leaves a widow and two daughters.

An interesting exhibition of naval practice was given in Boston Harbor by the squadron. The dry docks, elevators and telephone poles were objects of savage, but bloodless attacks in the display of gunnery. With the oars too, some practical lessons were given, that interested the spectators.

TITUS & BUCKLEY'S
Complete House Furnishing Emporium.

What is an Emporium? What goes into its make up? Why the term? The term at once suggests something large. A business conducted on an extensive scale. A mart of trade where everything of a special branch or several branches of a particular line are gathered together under one head. Such a combination properly managed affords at once immense advantages over single department stores. Advantages in the way of trading with one salesman. Buying your goods at one place. Quicker service. Contracting a single bill in place of three or four. And lower prices ALWAYS from the fact that the items of expense in running such a store are made smaller in a dozen ways. Such is our Emporium, and its popularity is best attested by our constantly increasing trade. Remember that we have four floors fully stocked with GOODS THAT SELL.

Dana's Sarsaparilla Co., Belfast, Maine.

Four score years.

Sunday, the 12th inst., was the eightieth birthday of Richard Smith, Sr., deacon of the South Congregational Church. His long life of integrity and spirituality has won the respect and esteem of all who know him. At the vestry service in the evening, which was largely attended, Rev. Mr. Hall, the pastor, spoke of his appreciation of Deacon Smith's faithful services to the church, and of his having borne with him in all the youth and inexperience of his ministry.

It added to the interest of the occasion that Rev. Mr. Sperry of Manchester, N. H., a former pastor, was present, and also Henry H. Proctor of Boston, a former deacon of the church.
After prayer from each of these, Mr.
Sperry spoke in a happy vein of this occasion being a Christian festival, and of his coming thirteen years ago into the home of Deacon Smith, who watched over him as a dear father in Jesus Christ. He said: "We want him to live on, and have high hope that a richer fruitage will come to him."

Deacon Smith offered prayer and then tenderly spoke of his appreciation of the occasion of which he felt unworthy. He thanked his friends for the generous and acceptable gift brought to him by his pastor in the morning. It was a purse of $120.
After prayer by Deacon Moore, Arthur F. Poole and B. F. Southwick, the meeting closed with the benediction by Mr. Sperry, after which many came forward to offer congratulations to the beloved deacon.

Under the Mistletoe.

A quiet wedding took place at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Charles P.
Petree on Pierpont street, Monday evening, when their daughter, Sarah W., was united in marriage to Mr. S.
Everett Knapp of the Downing-Knapp company, morocco manufacturers.

The ceremony was performed by Rev. Mr. Reynolds of the Baptist church, in presence of the relatives and very near friends of the contracting parties. After the ceremony, the happy couple took their departure for the White Mountains.

Killed on the Rail.

Patrick Sweeney, a well known figure of Peabody, was struck by the 12 50 train from Salem, on Tuesday nearly opposite the morocco factory of Peter Sim & Son, and instantly killed. He had been standing upon the spur track leading into the yard adjacent and just as the train came over Grove street crossing, stepped upon the main track.

The whistle was blown vigorously to warn him of the approaching danger, but he took no notice of the alarm, apparently not hearing it. Before it was possible to stop the train he was struck by the locomotive and thrown violently to the ground. His skull was crushed and blood spouted from his ears and nostrils.

As soon as possible the train was stopped and the lifeless form put on board and brought to Peabody, where it was laid in the baggage room. The police were notified and word was sent to his brothers.

Undertaker Fallon took charge of the remains and conveyed them to the residence of his mother on Hancock street.

The unfortunate victim was about 35 years of age and for years had led a desultory life, spending a great deal of time at the alms house and jail, in consequence of his insatiable appetite for drink. He was an inoffensive individual, naturally of a jovial disposition, but lacking the moral stamina to control his desire for liquor. He won the title of "Gentleman Fat" by his idle habits.

The Fire Flend Visits Lynn Once More.

Lynn was visited last night by another large fire that made her people think of the conflagration of November, 1889.
The fire started in a laundry on the third floor of the Blake building on Mulberry street and spread to the Strout block, following the line of shafting.
B. W. Currier's new block alongside was also on fire several times but was finally saved. The first two blocks named were totally destroyed, and much damage was done in other buildings by water and smoke. The total loss is placed at $235,000, but it is well covered by insurance. Relief calls were responded to by Boston, Malden, Swampscott, Marblehead, Salem and Peabody.

A steamer with four horses attached and Hose No. 1 were sent from this town.

The scenes of the fire is in close proximity to the locality where the great fire of '89 originated. The buildings are new, having been built to replace those burned a year and a half ago.

Scenes of wild excitement were presented on every hand. Merchants and others removed property from buildings to a great distance from the fire, in anticipation of another general conflagration.

LOCAL LINES.

The Sons of Veterans have enjoyed two days of camp at the lake, Lynnfield, this week.

There is no "bargain day" at the gains every day.

William F. Pingree of the night police has been granted a pension of $12 a month. He will receive arrears for eleven months in addition to the current allowance.

Assistant Engineer Charles H.
Hooper attended the Firemen's Muster at Bangor this week.

Copies of the acts and resolves of the last legislature can be obtained at the Town Clerk's office.

William P. Wilkinson was one of the judge's at the Firemen's muster at Bangor on Wednesday.

Owners of dogs were prompt to learn of the rescission of the order by the selectmen for muzzling canines.

Mrs. E. A. Sanborn of the Endicott school, Miss Georgia Batchelder of the Wallis and Ida M. Baker of the Bowditch went on Monday to Toronto to attend the International convention of school teachers.

John Ryan of Mt. Vernon street, disregarding the laws of physics, jumped off in the opposite direction to the motion of a car and landed on his head. He was fortunate in escaping injury.

A raid was made last Sunday morning by the police on William Barrett, at the corner of Northend and Holly streets. The visit was made at 3 30 and 46 bottles of lager were found in various parts of the premises.

A lot of small boys were riding on an overhead tramway at the abattoir of J. B. Thomas on Mill street when the vehicle got beyond their control and they were precipitated about 15 feet, the truck running off the end of the track.

The telemeter was inspected on Wednesday by a party of out-of-town gentlemen interested in water works.
The instrument which is made by the Standard Thermometer company gives excellent satisfaction. It was a good investment.

At the Methodist Episcopal church tomorrow the pastor Rev. W. P. Ray will preach at 10.30 A. M. The evening sermons are discontinued through ing with Praise Service at 7 P. M.

Sunday School at noon.

A salary with expenses paid will come handy to anyone who is now out of employment especially where no previous experience is required to get the position. If you want a position,

"A Chance to Make Money."

Rev. Joseph M. Hobbs took leave of his parish last Sunday. He leaves today for Providence where he will probably pass the summer. During the three years of his residence in Peabody, he has made many friends who will regret the separation.

Mrs. Thomas Logan of Dustin street swallowed a pin last Sunday evening while eating lettuce. She was taken to the Salem Hospital where she was operated upon and the pin was removed from the oesophagus by making an incision into the neck.

Have you visited the Salem Shoe Store, next door east of Sewall street, nearly opposite Mechanic Hall, Salem, and examined their line of Ladies', Misses' Gents' and Boys' boots and shoes? You can save money by trading at that store. All goods are represented—they are thoroughly reliable.

On every hand the question is asked when are they going to let George Stevens open his railroad station on Sundays. The inconvenience to the public is more annoying as the summer advances. People coming into towns are surprised that there is no place where a glass of soda can be obtained to cool the heated frame.

Educators are certainly the greatest benefactors to the race, and we, after reading Dr. Franklin Miles' popular works, cannot help in declaring him to among the most entertaining and educating authors. He is not a stranger to our readers, as the advertisement of the Miles' Medical Co., of which he ing goods at greatly reduced prices, to close out the summer stock. Now is the time to visit their mammoth store and avail yourself of their numerous bargains.

Henry Bagley was drowned in Danvers river last Sunday while boating near Horse Pasture point. Mr. John Ela, who was with him, made an attempt to save him and narrowly escaped with his own life. The remains were viewed by Medical Examiner Haddock and then taken in charge by Chief Peasley who had them conveyed to his late residence on

About midnight on Thursday, the building erected and used for a postoffice by ex-Postmaster O'Donnell at West Peabody, having stood idle since the appointment of Postmaster Brown nearly two years ago, terminated its existence by fire and smoke. The building was not so massive in its proportions nor ornate in architectural design as some of the edifices that adorn the large cities, but during its brief period of usefulness it served the purpose for which it was designed as well as more pretentious structures.

Removed from the protecting influence of the local fire department the building was left to waste its substance alone scarcely noticed save by the twinkling stars, and a few neighbors who came out to see the last of the conflagration. The fire is thought to have been incendiary. The loss was about $75.

THE MELVILLE MURDER

COPYRIGHT BY AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION, 1891.

Mrs. Clark Melville saw the movement and appeared distressed by it. For an instant she seemed resolved to advance along the walk for the purpose of meeting the loitering couple, and stopping by her own presence any private conversation they might be engaged in. The next moment she turned in the opposite direction and entered the building. For the next three minutes I heard her walking impatiently up and down the corridor which bounded the wing on the west.

In order for the couple to reach the wing door by the route they had taken, it became necessary for them to pass within a foot of the window where I stood.

I was not in sight from the walk. It is not always my duty to be in sight when I desire to know what is going on in my house. As the couple approached the window they stopped as though to gain time to complete an important conversation.

I could not hear what they said. Whenever Mrs. Caroline Green raised her voice above a cautious whisper, Mr. Richard Melville checked her. This of itself was suspicious, and I did my best to hear more.

At last they started slowly along the walk. As they passed the window where I stood I heard my patient's voice:

"If not here, then at the gate," the voice said, "and not later than nine!"

The next moment Mrs. Melville met them at the door and walked away with her hand on her son's arm.

CHAPTER XIV.

ALSO CONTRIBUTED BY THE MATRON OF THE INSANE ASYLUM.

He walked briskly up the street to the gate.

The more I thought of the scene I had witnessed on the lawn, and of the words I had heard Mrs. Caroline Green address to Richard Melville, the less I liked the idea of my patient walking on the lawn alone after nightfall.

I didn't like Richard Melville's defiant attitude.

I couldn't bear to think of the pitiful changes I had observed in Mrs. Caroline Green's demeanor.

It was plain to my mind that some kind of secret understanding existed between the two. I could not see why a person in Mr. Richard Melville's position should find it necessary to have a private understanding with a patient in an insane asylum.

The most sensible view to take of the matter was that Mr. Melville was only humoring the insane fancy of the woman in whom his mother took so great an interest. This is the view I finally forced myself to take.

But even taking this view of it, and knowing what I did of Mrs. Green's hallucination, it seemed to me to be my plain duty, in the interest of my patient, to prevent a second secret meeting.

To my mind the one meeting I had witnessed should not have been permitted, even in the presence of Mrs. Clark Melville. I resolved to place the whole matter before Mrs. Melville at the first opportunity.

Mind you, it did not occur to me that there was any wrong motive for the appointment at the gate. It does not matter what my opinion is now. It is sufficient if I state now that I was then only apprehensive of the effect on my patient's health of continued companionship with Richard Melville.

The result of my deliberation on the subject was a resolve that if my patient did meet Richard Melville at the iron gate in the night time I should not be very far away. My instructions were to allow her all the freedom from restraint possible under the rules of the asylum. I resolved to follow these instructions to the letter, and at the same time to make sure that the privilege was not abused.

Mrs. Green did not ask permission to visit the lawn in the evening until the third day after the appointment had been made. I granted the request as soon as made, and arranged to carry out my programme of surveillance.

My patient made her appearance on the lawn at eight o'clock. From my window I could watch her every movement without being seen. She walked about the place in the usual way for nearly an hour, stopping now at the fountain and now at the gate, before her manner betrayed the slightest impatience. Then her pauses at the gate became longer and more frequent.

Then it occurred to me that from the position I occupied it would be impossible for me to see and identify her visitor. The thought came to me that the appointment might not have been made for the man who made it. I had thought of nothing all day but the proposed meeting, and I was not willing that it should take place without my knowing more of it than I could learn from the window of my room. People who read this may set this down as a bit of feminine curiosity. Call it matronly prudence, and you will have it right.

A. I left my room, dressed for the street, an attendant stopped me with this statement and this question:

"Mr. Richard Melville came to the street door in person a short time ago and asked to have Mrs. Green notified that his engagement for the evening must be postponed. Shall I notify Mrs. Green?"

The statement surprised me. The question set me to thinking. I ordered the attendant to notify Mrs. Green, and returned instantly to my room. I soon saw the attendant speak to the woman waiting on the lawn and re-enter the house. Mrs. Green did not return to her room. She stood by the fountain fully five minutes, as if in thought, and then went to the street gate and remained there. In two minutes' time I stood at the corner of the building peering down the side street toward the lawn.

The street is a quiet one at all times. That night there appeared to be less life upon it than usual. A few people were passing up and down, but I saw no one either at the gate or loitering in its vicinity.

I was not satisfied I had heard the hour of nine named. I decided to keep the place in sight until that time. I did not believe in the good faith of the message left for Mrs. Green. Now you know why I waited.

To remain where I was was to attract attention if any visitor came from the south. I crossed the street and strolled along the pavement opposite the asylum. No one stood at the gate as I passed it. Nothing suspicious was observable.

At the next corner, as I turned west to cross the street to the asylum side, I was nearly run down by a pair of spirited horses attached to a close carriage which was being driven south at a most reckless speed.

The wheels of the carriage brushed my skirts as it swept by, and I stopped for a moment to watch its progress down the street. As I did so it reached a point nearly opposite the lawn gate, and the horses were pulled down to a slow walk, which was maintained through the rest of the block.

At the corner the vehicle came to a halt and a man sprang out. I noticed that he was too heavily wrapped for the temperature of the night. If I had remained at my first point of observation I should have met him face to face as he reached the pavement. He walked briskly up the street to the gate, shook it with what seemed to me to be a very muscular hand and passed on.

Then I made a miserable mistake. Instead of retracing my steps and watching him unseen, I walked faster so that I might meet him. My excuse is that I desired to be sure as to the identity of the man. If it turned out to be Mr. Richard Melville his mission there would be beyond a doubt, although I did not like the idea of his being there in spite of the message he had left. If it turned out to be an unknown man his strange conduct would serve to put me on my guard. Private asylums sometimes have strange experiences. I have had patients in my charge before now in whose liberty meddlesome people evinced a most troublesome interest. But that is neither here nor there. When I passed the man I could not be certain whether or not it was Richard Melville. But of one thing I am positive. My patient was nowhere in sight as I passed the lawn gate. This circumstance quieted my fears to some extent.

Whoever the stranger was, he became suspicious on account of my being there. Perhaps he saw that I was watching him. Perhaps he recognized me as belonging to the asylum. I did not see a signal given, but one certainly was given, for just then the person in charge of the carriage struck the horses sharply with the whip. In a moment the equipage was out of sight.

I reached my room in no pleasant frame of mind, you may be sure. If the man I had seen was Richard Melville I had nothing to fear but my patient's peace of mind. If it was not Richard Melville, I reasoned, I had some unknown conspiracy to contend with. I believed, however, that on account of the evident detection of the scheme to summon some one to the gate by the signal given no further mischief would be attempted that night.

Shortly after reaching my room an attendant came to make her final report for the night. At the door she turned back, and I saw by her manner that she had something on her mind. I told her to speak, and she came to the point at once.

"I have just come from the lawn gate," she began. "I don't like the way people have been hanging about there today. Once I suspected a tramping looking fellow of tampering with the lock and ordered him away. I have had my eye on the place all the evening, but nothing unusual has occurred. Mrs. Green was on the lawn until a short time ago, but she went to her room at once when I mentioned the matter to her. The gate and the door are secured as usual, and I think we are safe for the night, but it may be as well to be on our guard."

The information given by the attendant increased my alarm, but I dismissed her without mentioning what I had seen and went to bed.

Late in the night I was summoned to the reception room. There I met a reporter for one of the morning newspapers. The information he gave me was startling in the extreme. Mrs. Caroline Green had escaped from the asylum, and was then in the custody of the police at a down town station house.

CHAPTER XV.

EXTRACT FROM A MORNING NEWSPAPER.

A comparatively trifling accident on East Twenty-third street at an early hour this morning resulted in the unearthing of a most mysterious affair. Because of some small repairs not quite completed, the south side of the street was at the time closed at a point a short distance from the ferry. When those employed on the repairs left work for the night the usual barricade was erected on both sides of the dangerous spot, and the foreman in charge gave orders for the regulation warning signals to be displayed. Through the carelessness of some of the workmen this order was not obeyed.

The street at this point is well lighted,

The officer received a savage blow on the head from the handle of the revolver.

and in the common course of events nothing would have come of the omission. What happened was entirely out of the common course of events.

During the evening hundreds of vehicles passed the unguarded danger hole in safety, but these were driven with ordinary caution. At one o'clock this morning a pair of spirited horses, driven with anything but ordinary caution, dashed full against the west barricade and were thrown headlong to the pavement. All reports agree that the horses were being driven at an immoderate speed at the time of the accident.

Patrolman Maurice P. Gill, whose attention had previously been attracted to the vehicle by the unusual speed at which it was being driven, was first to arrive on the scene. He found the carriage overturned and the horses, still on the ground, struggling and kicking viciously. Two men, both unknown to the officer, were doing their best to right the carriage. The officer's first care was to call the attention of the men to the horses.

"If the horses regain their feet while the carriage is in this shape," he said, "and there is no one at their heads they will make a pretty mess of it."

With these words he turned to the vehicle. By this time several people had gathered about the place, at least four of them being officers. They quieted the horses and assisted them to their feet. Then they tugged at the overturned carriage until it was firm on its four wheels again, and the mischief caused by the carelessness of the driver had to all appearances been corrected. A casual examination of the horses, the carriage and the harness showed that no damage whatever had been occasioned by the accident.

In an instant the man in charge of the rig was in his seat in front, and the man who seemed to have been the passenger stood with his hand on the carriage door ready to resume his ride. In another moment the carriage would have been on its way to the ferry.

Prompted by some unaccountable impulse which he does not attempt to explain, the officer checked the man by placing a hand on his arm.

"Before you drive away," he said, "look to your companion; he may have been injured."

"You are mistaken," was the curt reply. "I have no companion. Drive on, coachman."

The officer was not satisfied. He signaled to an officer to look to the horses' heads, and still stood with his hand on the man's arm.

"I forbid your driving away until I have seen the interior of the carriage," he said. "Please stand aside."

The obstinate man at the carriage door hesitated. He opened his lips as though about to remonstrate or make a denial. Then something occurred that made such a proceeding unnecessary.

A frightened sob came from behind the closed doors of the carriage, and the voice was unmistakably that of a woman.

The muscular figure of the man still barred the entrance to the carriage by way of the door where he stood, but the opposite door was unguarded.

In response to a motion from the officer a patrolman opened this door and stepped inside. The next moment he reappeared in the street bearing in his arms the form of a fainting woman.

Reports differ as to exactly what occurred next. According to the officer's statement, he merely notified the man that explanations were in order, and that they must be made before the captain at the station house, thus practically taking him into custody. According to statements made by others, the officer seized the man in a rude and violent manner, at the same time informing him that he was under arrest.

Which ever account is the true one seems to be immaterial, except as affecting the conduct of the officer, for what followed was not warranted by either of the alleged occurrences. According to all present, the man at the carriage door drew a revolver and fired two shots at the officer in rapid succession.

Fortunately both of the shots missed their mark, but before anything could be done to ward off the attack the officer received a savage blow on the head from the handle of the revolver. As he fell stunned to the pavement the man who had dealt the blow entered the carriage, and the horses, smarting under stinging blows from the whip, dashed the patrolman aside and sprang away in the direction of the ferry. As yet no clew to the identity of the equipage or the persons connected with it has been obtained by the police.

The woman taken from the carriage was at once conveyed to the nearest station house. Only for the statement of her companion that the carriage had no occupant other than himself at the time of the accident, and but for the brutal attempt on the officer's life, the woman would have been allowed to have followed her own inclinations about accompanying the officers. As it was she was practically in custody when she left the carriage.

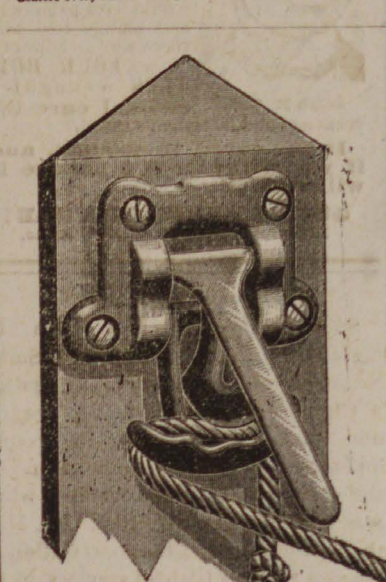

At the station house she talked freely about only a portion of the occurrences

SCOTT'S EMULSION

OF PURE COD LIVER OIL AND HYPOPHOSPHITES

Almost as Palatable as Milk.

So disgusting that it can be taken, digested, and assimilated by the most sensitive stomach, when the plain oil cannot be tolerated; and by the combination of the oil with the hypophosphites is much more efficacious.

Remarkable as a flesh producer.

Persons gain rapidly while taking it.

SCOTT'S EMULSION is acknowledged by Physicians to be the Finest and Best preparation in the world for the relief and cure of CONSUMPTION, SCROFULA, GENERAL DEBILITY, WASTING DISEASES, EMACIATION, COLDS and CHRONIC COUGHS.

The great remedy for Consumption, and Wasting in Children. Sold by all Druggists.

"Get another dozen lamp chimneys."

"What! are they all gone?"

"Yes."

"I'm going to try a sort I've been reading about, if I have to send to Pittsburgh for 'em. Macbeth & Co.'s 'pearl-top.'"

"They say their chimneys don't break."

"Another humbug, probably."

"Don't Muggins keep 'em?"

"I'm going to see. Give me a postal card. I'll have that chimney, anyhow."

Muggins got 'em for him, and did a thriving chimney business for several weeks, till everybody got 'em; and somehow his trade has increased all round ever since.

Our Canadian Colony.

The Canadian when he crosses the border in search of a broader horizon and a competence has very little to unlearn. Once he has passed through the trying ordeal of unstrapping his trunks for the inspection of the Custom officers, and has recovered his equanimity as he rattles along into the heart of Uncle Sam's country, he is no longer in a foreign land. And the Canadians, English, and French, are flocking into the States at all points by thousands every year. The only really deep rooted anti-American feeling in the country is the peculiar monopoly of those eccentric patriots who fought against their kith and kin in the Revolutionary War, and who, through the fortunes of war, were compelled to emigrate into what was then the wilderness of Nova Scotia.

The Anti-American sentiment has absolutely no existence among the masses. There is, indeed, a tendency to regard the States as a veritable E. Dorado, where dollars are picked up in the street. New England Magazine.

of the night. She gave the name of Caroline Green, and stated that she had been abducted from a private asylum, where she was receiving treatment for disease of the brain. She refused to reveal the names of the persons concerned in the outrage. She even declined to state in what manner she had been decoyed from the asylum.

In a private interview with a reporter, however, Captain John B. Johnson, in charge of the station house at the time, made some statements which may throw some light on the mystery.

"Mrs. Caroline Green," he said, "is the person believed by the police to be guilty of the murder of Mrs. Clark Melville's coachman. Mrs. Melville's protection alone accounts for her absence from the Tombs tonight. You must take what she says with a great deal of allowance. My own opinion is that she was not abducted at all. I believe that at the time of the accident she was fleeing from the asylum to escape the watchful eye of the department. Now that she is here I shall see that she remains in custody until the matter is fully investigated."

Mrs. Clark Melville was seen at her home at an early hour this morning. She seemed greatly distressed at what had taken place, but refused to talk. The reporter left her walking up and down her splendid reception room in an agony of grief.

"Are you certain the officers are not being deceived?" she asked, as the reporter turned away. "It can't be true! I am sure it can't be true! Go to the asylum and see if Mrs. Green is not there, safe and well. I won't believe it until I know that she is not there!"

At the asylum the reporter was the first one to convey the news of the abduction. The matron appeared in the parlor when summoned to meet the reporter in a condition bordering on frenzy. Accompanied by the reporter she visited the rooms assigned to Mrs. Green, and found that the bed had not been occupied during the night.

According to the theory of the matron Mrs. Green in some way secured a key to a door opening upon a small lawn located between her rooms and the street wall, and passed out of the building in that way. The street gate was found unlocked.

The matron tried to appear frank in her statements, but it was evident to the reporter that she was trying to conceal something. She stated, however, that previous to retiring for the night she was informed by an attendant that suspicious persons had been hanging about the street gate all day. She gave no excuse for not investigating the report at once, and seemed to treat the matter very lightly. The attendant, when closely questioned, declared that it would be impossible for her to identify any of the persons she had seen about the gate during the day.

CHAPTER XVI.

CONTRIBUTED BY THE CAPTAIN OF POLICE.

"When I open my lips your peace of mind will be at an end."

I have been requested by Mr. Charles Gates to write down whatever I can recollect of the interviews that took place in my office on the morning after Mrs. Caroline Green was taken into custody on Twenty-third street by Officer Gill.

Mrs. Green was sitting, silent and in tears, in my private office when Officer Gates entered.

"Well," he said, advancing to her side, "you have at last succeeded in doing what the police power of the state failed to do. You have placed yourself beyond the pale of Mrs. Clark Melville's protection."

"Oh, sir," she said, standing before him wringing her hands, "I ask nothing but to be allowed five minutes' conversation with Mrs. Melville. Has any one here seen her since last night? What does she say of me? Will no one go for her?"

Mr. Gates beckoned me into the outer office and asked:

"Have you any objections to her seeing Mrs. Melville?"

I hesitated. I had my own ideas concerning the two murders that had taken place on Mrs. Clark Melville's premises. I did not approve of the course Mrs. Clark Melville had taken with regard to Mrs. Green.

"Hold on," said Officer Gates, interrupting a train of thought that would certainly have led to a refusal; "I believe I know what you are thinking of. You think that an interview between Mrs. Green and Mrs. Clark Melville is more than likely to result in the continued interference of Mrs. Clark Melville in behalf of the prisoner. Let me tell you how to place yourself in a position to counteract such interference. You shall hear every word that passes between the two ladies. Then, if Mrs. Melville has any motive whatever other than her natural kindness of heart in again throwing her powerful influence between the prisoner and the law, you shall know what it is."

With this understanding I consented that the prisoner should see Mrs. Melville if she called.

Mr. Gates must have gone directly to Mrs. Melville's house, for in half an hour her carriage was standing in front of the station, and she was facing Mrs. Green in the private office.

It is not necessary that I should describe the spot from which I heard the conversation that followed. It is enough to say that I could not have heard it plainer had I occupied a seat in the room. All police stations have, I believe, secret and convenient rooms for the use of officers in cases of emergency.

Mrs. Melville's first words were words of sympathy.

"I am sorry to see you here," she said. Mrs. Green's only answer was a burst of tears.

"Tell me," said Mrs. Melville kindly, "why you left the asylum. Did you leave it voluntarily, my poor child?"

"Yes."

"At midnight, and with a person who a few moments later and in your very presence made an attempt to kill an officer of the peace?"

"Yes, oh, yes! Have pity on me! Have pity on yourself!"

"I don't like the looks of it," went on the kind voice. "The public officers have time and again objected to my interference in your behalf. How do I know that the public officers are not responsible for your leaving the asylum and for your being in custody now? How do I know that the attempt on the officer's life was not a subterfuge?"

"Kindest of women and best of friends, if you only knew!"

"My poor child, what is to prevent my knowing? In all the years you lived in my house you never deceived me. Are you going to begin now?"

"I can't speak the words. When I open my lips your peace of mind will be at an end. Strike me dead before I make your life as unhappy as my own!"

"I don't understand you, my poor child. Speak out!"

For a moment there was silence in the room; then I heard the prisoner's voice, speaking slowly and between sobs:

"Try, oh, try to understand! Recall to mind the anxiety you felt and tried in vain to hide the day Richard and I loitered on the little lawn at the asylum. Go back to the talk of the servants in your house. Think how unlike your son Richard has been for days and days, and then have pity and do not ask me who accompanied me from the asylum last night! Have pity and do not ask me in whose house and under what circumstances I found the man who wed me years ago in Maine."

A sharp ring of the bell on my office table was the only reply. Officer Gates and I entered the room by different doors at the same instant.

THE MARBLEHEAD Messenger, in commenting on the action of the Selectmen of that town in granting a rehearing upon the petition of the Naumkeag Street Railway company, fails to find any adequate reason for such a proceeding. The sentiment of the town is represented as practically unchanged from what it was some months ago, when the petition was heard. The petition is characterized as an entering wedge to secure permits from Beverly and Danvers to string overhead wires. Marblehead is considered by the Messenger as the pivot upon which success in the two other towns is to turn. And it is suggested that the press of Beverly and Peabody are expected to be ready to furnish the necessary arguments in favor of the scheme.

We presume our esteemed cotemporary meant, however, the press of Danvers, as Peabody is already decorated with a network of overhead wires that threaten to obscure the light of the sun, moon and stars, and there could be little inducement for Peabody to advocate the extension of wires into neighboring towns, unless upon the ground that misery loves company. Some advantages would occasionally be noticed by the traveling public by a general extension of the electric lines upon the Naumkeag system, but if anything is to be gained it is by the people of the towns that have thus far excluded the wires from their streets. The Selectmen having now granted the permit in Marblehead we presume Beverly and Danvers will soon follow suit.

AN ADVERTISEMENT for bids for carrying United States mail to foreign countries in American built ships, owned, officered and largely manned by American citizens, is to be published by the Postmaster General, under the recent postal aid law.

The object of the law is to divert the ocean carrying trade from foreign into American bottoms, and although contracts will be awarded to the lowest bidders, thus giving established lines an advantage, it is expected that American enterprise and capital will become interested and many new steamers of various classes will be built and put in commission.

Quicker passage of the foreign mails will be demanded and new routes are to be opened up, from which will result increased accommodations to the general public whatever may be the outcome of the shipping scheme.

THE STATE convention at Cleveland, Ohio, this week adopted a lengthy platform, declaring for free silver, free trade and possibly for free rum. The latter was not mentioned in terms, but the allusions to restrictions of personal privileges might easily be taken as a general manifestation against the sale of liquor.

A minority report was made by some of the members of the committee on resolutions, favoring honest money and opposing the free silver scheme, and while it was supported by a large vote, the majority sentiment was in favor of free coinage. The vote stood 300 1-2 to 399 1-2.

Three names were presented to the convention as candidates for nomination and the vote stood 508 7-16 for Campbell, 134 9-16 for Neal and 56 for Kline. Congressman Johnson received one vote. A motion to make the nomination unanimous was put to vote and declared carried, although Milton county voted vociferously in the negative.

THE FEELING is strong in the minds of leading Republicans that the close of the current year will terminate the rule of the present incumbent in the gubernatorial chair. Republicans are expected to be more united this fall than they were a year ago, when through jealousies, discontent or too much confidence in the strength of the Republican party of Massachusetts, Governor Russell was elected over Mr. Brackett.

There was no one cause to which could be ascribed alone the defeat of Mr. Brackett, but all of the causes together combined to reduce the vote, not only upon the head of the ticket, but on the various minor officers as well.

Massachusetts has always been a strong Republican state, but the members of the dominant party failed to heed the maxim whose disregard has caused many a failure in former times, "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." But with the spirit of harmony in her ranks and vigorous work on the part of her leaders, the Grand Old Party can resume the front rank in the coming state campaign and the numerous offices in the government of the Commonwealth can be filled by Republicans the next year as they have in former years.

Prestige of power and position is a good thing, but earnest, vigorous, harmonious work is what counts in politics as well as anything else.

No one has as yet been decided upon in the minds of the majority of the party, for a leader. Several names have been suggested, some of which are highly acceptable. Some of the gentlemen named could not probably be induced to enter the lists upon any consideration. Speaker Barrett of the House of Representatives has been favorably mentioned for the leadership, but it is not certain that he will be a candidate his fall.

EX-SENATOR CHANDLER has given his political successor a temporary rest to turn his batteries upon General Manager Furber, of the Boston & Maine Railroad company, for violating, as he claims through the columns of his paper, the interstate commerce law, by giving passes to newspaper publishers, their friends and families.

The late representative from New Hampshire to the higher branch of Congress may know whereof he speaks, but it will take considerable proof to make the average publisher or the public believe that the gentleman whom he has thus attacked has been guilty of the infractions of the law referred to. Previous attacks had been made by the same paper upon the road and its manager, of such a nature that Mr. Furber concluded to sever the business relations that existed between the company and the paper, and the passes that had been furnished were called in. In view of these circumstances it looks as if the motive for the allegations of breaking the law were founded in personal rather than public policy.

A RECENT scheme of organization of the Republican editors, started by Commissioner George H. Merrill and a few other politicians, is denounced by the Woburn Journal in the following terms:

When the score or less of Republican editors got together in Boston it was found that the movement was nothing more nor less than an impudent scheme hatched in the brain of some impetuous quilldriver out of a job to get up an organization with a view to furnishing Republican editors with their politics this summer hot from the factory of the State Committee, which scheme, it was also found, couldn't be made to work worth a cent.

It was so manifestly a plan to bring a few country editors, with more cheek than brains, into public notice, and to furnish a pretext for an additional hanger-on at the State Committee Headquarters with good pay; and it was made so plain that Republican country editors propose to run their own papers in their own way, and are abundantly able to do their own thinking and writing without dictation from Republican clubs and committees, that the whole thing was severely sat down on by all intelligent editors present, and the affair resulted in a poor, little pitiable fizzle.

ESSEX COUNTY.

The Thompson-Houston company have 2716 names on their pay roll this week.

Richard Lynch of West Newbury fell from a load of hay Sunday and broke two ribs.

Mayor Fogg, after visiting the Newhall farm, objects to its purchase for an almshouse site for Lynn's indigents.

William Norwood fell from a bicycle in an apoplectic fit Monday, at Lynn. He was taken to the hospital.

A young man about 19 years of age was drowned in Shawsheen river, near the picnic grove at Andover, on Monday, while bathing.

T. M. Hutchinson, clerk at the Naumkeag Clothing company, who is stopping at North Andover, shot a young fox Tuesday night.

Alexander B. Clark's new steamer Cygnets is doing a thriving business, carrying passengers between Parker River Bridge, Newbury, the Bluff and Grape Island.

In Lawrence the increase in polls over last year is 543. The valuation is $31,522,000, an increase since 1890 of $1,010,000. The tax rate is the same as last year, $14.80 per $1000.

Rev. Phillips Brooks is rusticating at North Andover. He says his consecration as bishop will not take place for two or three months. Meanwhile he is enjoying life in rural quietude.

Joseph Richards of Beverly lost the sight of an eye on Monday evening in a singular manner. He was opening a bottle of ginger beer, when a piece of broken glass flew up and struck the ball of the eye.

Mrs. Marshall of Marblehead jumped from a fast moving train at Danvers Junction on Tuesday. She wanted to get out there and the train did not stop. She was lamed and bruised, but was able to go home.

James Connelly was arrested at Hotel Nahant for disorderly behavior on Tuesday and discharged by the court. He will sue the officer for assault. The club was used freely in the arrest, so he claims.

The rumor of a contract with the Westinghouse Electric company to equip the road to Boston is said to be unfounded. The Thompson-Houston company will probably receive the contract when it is placed.

Mrs. Mary Collins of Johnson street, Newburyport, died at her residence on Monday, at the advanced age of 101 years. She was the oldest inhabitant of the city. She leaves one son, John, and six grandchildren.

The falling of a wire set off an alarm from the box at the lower Pacific Mills at Lawrence on Tuesday morning, calling out the entire department. A big scare was given the city, but all was calm at the mill among the 2500 operatives.

According to the assessor's report, just made public, the valuation of Haverhill is $19,782,821, against $17,870,732 last year, showing an increase of $1,912,049. Number of polls, 8012, giving an increase of 571 over last year.

Hon. Redfield Procter, Secretary of War, and family, are occupying their summer residence at Marblehead. Secretary Procter returns to Vermont, in August to entertain President Harrison and members of his Cabinet, after the dedication of the Bennington Monument.

A large return is promised the Thompson-Houston Electric Welding Co., from the manufacture of electrically welded shells. An American company will begin operations in a week or two, and all the powers of Europe will establish factories. The shell thus made is very much cheaper than those of ordinary construction.

While adjusting a belt on a pulley at V. K. & A. H. Jones' Lynn factory a workman lost control of the belt and the latter, in slipping off, struck the automatic sprinkler, ripping off a pipe and flooding the different floors of the building. There was 80 pounds' pressure on the sprinklers at the time. The damage will amount to several hundred dollars, it is stated.

The Selectmen of Marblehead gave another hearing to the Naumkeag Street Railway Company on their petition for leave to erect poles and string wires through the streets of the town, on Monday night. A number of citizens spoke for and against the scheme. A vote was taken before adjournment, and over 200 voted in favor of granting the franchise. The company's shortcomings were pretty well shown up at the hearing, but the Selectmen have given the desired permit.

Work on the new St. James church in Salem is progressing rapidly under the direction of the contractor, J. W. Dornis of Providence, R. I. He can be found on duty all day and at work as hard as any of his men. There are 35 men in all, 9 stone layers and about a dozen stone cutters. All the stone used on the outer walls is cut on the works. The basement wall will be stone to a height of 25 feet, 14 feet of it being now laid. There are 4 derricks and 2 engines used on the works. The corner stone will be laid Sunday, Aug. 30th. Each man seems to work for the interest of the contractor, and well they might, as he is a perfect gentleman.

LOCAL LINES.

A beautiful souvenir album with descriptive text of Salem's landmarks and places of interest has been published by Almy, Bigelow & Washburn. It is very neat in design, the cover being a vignette of John Endicott. The title, "Salem—Past and Present," suggests the nature of the subjects of illustration, but the quality of the work must be seen to be appreciated. The illustrations are heliogravures, and reveal careful work, both on the part of the photographer and the makers of the plates, which have been used to excellent advantage by the printer. The accompanying text is interesting and instructive, and the whole is a testimony to the enterprise of the publishing house, Almy, Bigelow & Washburn.

If you have ever visited the studios of the metropolis where the elite are accustomed to bestow their patronage, you will notice a fineness of tone and a peculiar richness of quality in the photographs that they display. Homely people do not look handsome, but somehow the photograph seems to relieve the features of their ugly proportions while yet on inspection they are found true to nature. Such is the quality of photographs one sees at Hussey's 252 1-2 Essex street, Salem, and our Peabody friends are fast finding it out, judging from the frequency with which his name appears upon the fine cabinets we so frequently see. His standard in crayon and colored portraiture is as high as in his photography. He is a thorough artist.

St. John's Sunday School Society enjoyed a picnic at Centennial Grove on Tuesday. Ten cars conveyed the party which numbered about 600. They returned at 7.30 o'clock somewhat tired by the heat of the day and the round of sports. The following program of contests went to make up the attractions of the occasion: Running match for boys fourteen years old, 150 yards, won by Joseph Butler; running match open to all, half mile dash, won by Thomas Butler; three legged race, won by James Lillis and Timothy Riordan; dory race, won by Edward Cotter. In the morning the Keystone defeated the Father Mathews Jr., by the score of 20 to 7 and won $3.50 and a ball. A good game was played in the afternoon between the Father Mathews Sr., and the P. H. S. nine for a prize of $6 and a ball. The latter won 9 to 5, and were in every way superior to their opponents. After the game the victorious nine were photographed.

Comrades of Union Post, G. A. R., and others wishing to visit Detroit, Michigan, will leave the station here at 7.30 o'clock Sunday morning August 2. It is important that all who desire to go in the party should hand their names to the committee on Monday, as an assessment will be levied Monday evening. Comrades will wear badges of leather and sheepskin, as emblems of the dominant industries of the town.

On Wednesday next, July 23, there will be four races at Rockdale Park, South Peabody, including a 3-minute class, 2.40 race, gentlemen's road wagon race and a bicycle race, all under the management of J. C. Walcott. Entries in the bicycle races close Saturday, July 18, with R. H. Robson, the well known manufacturer and dealer in bicycles, at his store, 154 Essex street, Salem.

The strong Gloucester High School baseball team met its first defeat of the season at the hands of the Peabody High School nine, on square field last Saturday afternoon, by a score of 18 to 8. The game was one-sided, the visitors being unable to fathom Jimmie Eagan's curves, securing but four hits, while the opposing pitcher was batted hard and often.

At the request of the School Committee the boiler at the Center School was inspected by experts from Salem and Lowell, who agree in condemning it. The boiler has been in use 22 years and will be replaced by a new one.

THE GREAT BUSINESS IN DRY GOODS

that has been built up at Essex and Washington streets, Salem—perhaps the largest business in this line in the city—has proven a subject of interest to many people, and numerous are the queries that have been put regarding the causes which have led to the result, or, as some have phrased it, the secret of the success. The only reply we can make is that there is no secret about the matter.

RELIABILITY OF SERVICE

— AND —

MODERATION OF PRICES

have alone led to the desired end. The ruling principle with many houses as expressed in constant advertising, is the latter—"LOWNESS OF PRICES."

If there is any secret in our method of doing business, it lies in the fact that while we have always lead in moderation of prices, yet we have ever from the foundation of our house, nearly six years ago, placed ABOVE EVERYTHING

RELIABILITY OF SERVICE.

We aimed from the first to seek the interest of our patrons, and to serve them well in every transaction, small or large, so as inevitably to win their confidence, and to secure gradually their constant patronage.

Our corps of help in the different departments of our house are thoroughly imbued with this spirit, hardly a month passes that our competitors do not make overtures to our department people to come with them and try and build up their business like ours; but they never go; for various reasons, one of which is that where the people have little confidence it is hard to build up business, and after informing us of the wonderfully liberal promises made to them, they state that they had rather be with us, largely owing to our liberal dealings with all. Hundreds of customers have dealt steadily with us, almost exclusively for the whole period of those six years; they have introduced others, and they the same until the number is thousands, who rarely go elsewhere for the specialties we keep. The methods of which the great business of this house has been built up, it is proposed to continue indefinitely, temporary and seeming advantages being sacrificed continually in subordination to the broad, underlying principle of the store—to seek its own interest only and THROUGH A PROPER SERVICE OF ITS PATRONS. While all human transactions are necessarily imperfect of execution, this is our ideal of business and the standard we keep constantly before us.

There are other branches of this interesting subject to which we may call attention at a future time.

SCROFULA

Is that impurity of the blood which produces unsightly lumps or swellings in the neck; which causes running sores on the arms, legs, or feet; which develops ulcers in the eyes, ears, or nose, often causing blindness or deafness; which is the origin of pimples, cancerous growths, or "humors," which, fastening upon the lungs, causes consumption and death. It is the most ancient of all diseases, and very few persons are entirely free from it.

How Can It Be CURED

By taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which, by the remarkable cures it has accomplished, has proven itself to be a potent and peculiar medicine for this disease. If you suffer from scrofula, try Hood's Sarsaparilla. "Every spring my wife and children have been troubled with scrofula, my little boy, three years old, being a terrible sufferer. Last spring he was one mass of sores from head to feet. We all took Hood's Sarsaparilla, and all have been cured of the scrofula. My little boy is entirely free from sores, and all four of my children look bright and healthy." W. B. ATHERTON, Passaic City, N. J.

Who Owns the Willows Pavilion?

A bill in equity has been brought by Dr. William Mack of Salem against Abner C. Goodell, Jr., to recover the Siege of Paris building, Pavilion and land under and adjoining. The bill sets forth that in 1880 the Doctor (who was one of the principal owners in the Naumkeag Railway) gave money to Mr. Goodell (the President of the road) to purchase the Siege of Paris building, and have it removed to the Willows, and also to purchase the land in question, and supposed the deeds were in the name of the Doctor, but ascertained about three months before commencing proceedings in equity, that instead, Mr. Goodell had taken the deeds in his own name. Judge Sherman has issued a temporary injunction, restraining Mr. Goodell from conveying the property, and the case will come up for final adjudication later.

It has always been understood by the public, that the Pavilion, park and Siege of Paris building belonged to Dr. Mack, such having been stated in the newspapers at the time and never having been contradicted.

The case will be an interesting one and will be watched with interest.

The Governor's Appointments
Governor Russell has nominated his private Secretary, Jeremiah W. Coveney for Gas Commissioner to succeed Mr. Coffin. The nomination was confirmed under suspension of the rules.

The Governor has also made the following nominations:—Board of commissioners for the promotion of uniformity of legislation in the United States, in accordance with chapter 405, acts of 1891: Edmund H. Bennett of Taunton, Frederick J. Simson of Dedham and Leonard A. Jones of Boston. Trial justice, Essex county—Orlando B. Tenney of Georgetown, reappointment. Medical examiners—Erastus C. Coy of Montague, Andrew H. Hodgdon of Dedham, George S. Osborne of Peabody, all reappointments. The commission for the promotion of uniformity of legislation in the United States is an unpaid commission authorized by the last Legislature. Mr. Bennett is well known as the author of Farm Law. He is one of the finest lawyers in the State. The other two appointees are lawyers of high standing and are known as compilers of law text books.

Installation.

District Deputy Lewis of Swampscott, assisted by his staff, installed the following officers at Holten Lodge of Odd Fellows on Tuesday evening: W. F. Munroe, N. G.; George S. Smith, V. G.; Henry Baetje, R. S.; G. F. Sanger, T.; D. A. Goodrich, O. G.; Joseph Clotkey, I. G.; F. L. Sears, chap.; C. S. Batchelder, R. S. N. G.; Justin Jones, L. S. N. G.; Jos. Blake, R. S. V. G.; Thomas Foster, L. S. V. G.; Albert Butler, warden.

After the ceremonies the cars were taken for Salem Willows where a supper was served. About fifty sat down to the spread and the party returned at half past eleven.

World's Fair.

Five special commissioners sailed from New York on July 9th, with the purpose of arousing throughout Europe an active interest in the World's Columbian Exposition. Much has been accomplished already in this direction by the Department of Publicity and Promotion, but it has been recognized from the beginning that the best results could be obtained only through personal visitation by influential men, officially representing the Exposition.

Tulare, California, proposes to furnish a very novel exhibit for the Fair. From a gigantic redwood tree, 390 feet high, and 26 feet in diameter, will be cut two lengths forty-five feet long, and these will be transformed into full-sized railway coaches by hollowing out the interior. The rough bark of the tree will be left on the roof and on the sides and ends the natural wood will be left unpolished. The interior will be finished after the style of Pullman cars. One will be a buffet dining car, with bath, barber-shop and kitchen, and the other a sleeper, with observation room. Ordinary car trucks will be put underneath, and the men of Tulare, with their wives and children, will make the trip to Chicago in these strange coaches and live in them while there. The intention is to keep these cars in the Exposition grounds, and to sell as mementos the portions of the tree cut away in their construction.

The lumbermen of Washington have promised to contribute all the material necessary for the construction of the building of that State at the Exposition, and the Northern Pacific has agreed to transport the exhibit free of charge. Thus Washington can expend upon its exhibit the entire $100,000, which was appropriated.

Dr. George S. Osborne has been appointed Medical Examiner.

About 2000 feet of edgestones have been laid by Supt. Besse, this season.

A Wife to Her Angered Husband.

To-day, if I were dead, and could not feel, Your kisses and your tears upon my face; If all the world could give of woe, or weal, Could find within my heart no resting place; You would not think of any bitter past; You would not chide for a careless word; You could not be so cruel, at the last, As to condemn me, unconfessed, untrue and dead; If I were lying, wrapt about in white, With flowers all around me, on my breast, And in my hands; and on my face the light That angels shed upon their dead at rest; If I were lying thus, and one should say Such bitter things as you have said to me, With bitter anger you would drive away That one and swear 'twere all base calumny If I were lying underneath the ground, And all the white snow heaped above my head, And you, amid the many, one had found Who dared to say such things about me dead; You had not words to tell how false were they, How most unkind was he of unkind men; Yet all the cruel words that he might say Would not have power to hurt me, grieve me then. If you in coming back to-day should find That death had entered and had called me hence, How would it be with you in your own mind? Where for your grief could find recompense? The lips that you refused to kiss were still; They had no chidings; erst they did not chide, Nor tell their grievance, closed by a firm will, Held in dominion by a sterner pride. Oh, God! that one must live and live and live, And try to be contented with the hope That he who knoweth all, somewhere, will give The fullest love to fill the widest scope! Yet here, oh, love! why should the days grow long, And through unkindness bitter? Death is near. If you will love me when I'm dead, I pray Grant me somewhat of love and kindness here. I'll not rebuke you though my heart be full; I dare not chide; I, too, may be astray; Experience yet may teach—a bitter school—Me what to do, and what, perchance, to say. And yet I ask you humbly, tenderly, If I should answer never more your call, Would you not grieve of all most bitterly For words and deeds that are beyond recall? —Fourth Church Record.

Science in Schools.

A scientist has been making a plea for its introduction into school courses. He says it should not be a matter of experimenting with acids and gases, with air pumps and electrical machines but it should be brought home as nature's message to the hearts as well as to the minds of the young. It should teach them justice and impress on them that there is a right, that there is a true, that there are moral balances as well as chemical ones, and that there are conditions of moral stability just as of chemical or mechanical or electrical. The teacher who cannot extract moral instruction and inspiration out of physical science ought to leave it alone—whether he is fit to teach anything is a question.—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

HEIGHT OF CRUELTY.

Nervous women seldom receive the sympathy they deserve. While often the picture of health, they are constantly ailing. To withhold sympathy from these unfortunates is the height of cruelty. They have a weak heart, causing the shortness of breath, fluttering, pain in side, weak and hungry spells, and finally swelling of ankles, oppression, choking, smothering and dropsy. Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure is just the thing for them. For their nervousness, headache, weakness, etc., his Restorative Nerve is unequalled. Fine treatise on "Heart and Nervous Diseases" and marvelous testimonials free. Sold and guaranteed by Wm. T. Lee.

A drummer in a Grand Rapids merchant's store was making some inquiries about his business.

You run the establishment alone, I notice, he began. Yep. Anybody in with you? Yep. His name doesn't appear on your sign? Nope. Ah! A silent partner? Not much! It's my wife.

July Days. The woods are dense with full-grown leafage. Of all the trees only the basswood has delayed its blossoming, to crown the height of summer and fill the sunsteeped air with a perfume that calls all the wild bees from hollow tree and scant woodside gleaning to a wealth of honey gathering, and all the hive-dwellers from their board-built homes to a finer and sweeter pillage than is offered by the odorous white sea of buckwheat. Half the flowers of wood and field are out of bloom. Herdsgrass, clover and daisy are falling before the mower. The early grain fields have already caught the color of the sun and the tasseling corn rustles its broad leaves above the rich loam that the woodchuck delights to bore. The dwindling streams have lost their boisterous clamor of springtide and wimple with subdued voices over beds too shallow to hide a minnow or his poised shadow on the sunlit shallows. The sharp eye of the angler probes to the bottom, the green depths of the slowly swirling pools, and discovers the secrets of the big fish who congregate therein.

The river has marked the stages of its decreasing volume with many lines along its steep banks, and discloses the muskrat's doorway, to which he once dived so gracefully, but now must clumsily climb to. Rafts of driftwood bridge the shallow current sunk so low that the lithe willows bend in vain to kiss its warm bosom. This only the swaying trails of the water-weeds toy with now, these and the rustling sedges and swift-winged swallows coyly touching it. There is not depth to hide the scurrying schools of minnows, the half of whom fly into the air in a curving burst of silver shower before the rush of a pickerel, whose green and mottled sides gleam like a swift-shot arrow in the downright sunbeams. The sandpiper tilts along the shelving shore. Out of an embowered harbor a woodchuck conveys her fleet of ducklings, and on the ripples of their wake the anchored argosies of the water lilies toss and cast adrift their cargoes of perfume. Above them the green heron perches on an overhanging branch, uncouth but alert, whether sentinel or scout, flapping his awkward way along the ambient bends and reaches. With slow wing beats he signals the coming of some more lazily moving boat, that drifts at the languid will of the current or indolent pull of oars that grate on the golden meshed sand pebbles.

Lazily, unexpectedly, the angler casts his line, to be only a convenient perch for the dragon flies; for the fish, save the affrighted minnows and the hungry pickerel, are as lazy as he. Today he may enjoy to the full the contemplations disturbed by any funny folk of the under-water world, while dreamily he floats in sunshine and dappled shadow, so at one with the placid waters and quiet shores that woodchuck, sandpiper and heron, scarcely note his unobtrusive presence.—Forest and Stream.

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS.

William T. Lee, druggist, believes that the secret of success is perseverance. Therefore he persists in keeping the finest line of perfumery, toilet articles, cosmetics, drugs and chemicals on the market. He especially invites all persons who have palpitation, short breath, weak or hungry spells, pain in side or shoulder, oppression, night mare, dry cough, smothering, dropsy or heart disease to try Dr. Miles' unequalled New Heart Cure, before it is too late. It has the largest sale of any similar remedy. Fine book of testimonials free. Dr. Miles' Restorative Nerve is unsurpassed for sleeplessness, headache, fits, etc., and it contains no opiate.

Fanatics in Turkey.

I am told that among Christians in the Levant much uneasiness prevails at the signs of increasing fanaticism among the Turks. A shrewd Turkish official is reported to have said recently of his fellow countrymen: "At the end of the Crimean war 10 per cent of the Turks were religious fanatics; at the death of the Abdul Aziz, 50 per cent; today there are 90 per cent." There is evidence of this in every direction. Only a few weeks ago four Christian boys, employed by a foreign resident to collect bulbs, disappeared a few miles from Smyrna. Their remains were subsequently found burned. Such evidence as was obtained pointed to a diabolical religious outrage, but no one has ever been put on his trial.—London Truth.

Two German Words That Mean Much.

German barbers in New York have a curious system of signs and mysterious words by which they indicate to each other the tendency of customers to give large tips, small tips or none at all. If a new barber in a large shop gets a generous customer in his chair, a fellow workman who has shaved the generous customer before mutters in his ear, "Brunz"—that is, "He tips." "Brunz" is a distinctively German product, and till recently was never heard outside of continental barber shops. Its greatest merit is that it means nothing to persons who are not barbers, for it has no indorsement from the German dictionaries, and does not even enjoy the questionable authority of student slang. German barbers in New York designate a man who gives no gratuities as a "muff." Like "brunz," "muff" is no word at all, and was invented by wily continental barbers for the needs of the shop only. The amount of the tip to be expected is revealed by the old journeyman to the new ones by various contortions of the fingers and by low German monosyllables of no apparent relevancy.—Montreal Star.

Stones Are Composed of Shells.

The tripoli, used for polishing our tableware, is composed entirely of the silicious shells of infusoria. The earthly paint with which our houses are colored is nothing but the remains of different species of these animals. Even the hardest rocks—the flints—show, when examined under the microscope, that they, too, are composed of the skeletons of infusoria. I once examined a thin section of a flint formerly used by the great hunter, Daniel Boone. This flint was composed of the shells of infusoria. The gun, an old flintlock rifle, from which this flint was taken, is still preserved at Frankfort, Ky.

Even many of the precious stones, such as the carnelian, owe their beautiful colors to the presence of fossil infusoria.—Macon Telegraph.

When acid is dropped on an article of wearing apparel pour ammonia immediately upon the spot to neutralize the effect of the acid; then apply chloroform and the original color will in almost every case return.

PROF. MARK W. HARRINGTON.

A radical change has been effected of late in the Weather Bureau at Washington. It has been transferred from the War Department to the Department of Agriculture, in accordance with an act passed by the last Congress. As it went into effect, General Greely relinquished his duties as Chief of the Bureau and Professor Mark W. Harrington, of Michigan, was appointed his successor. He has been Professor of Astronomy in the State University at Anne Arbor, Mich., and editor of the American Meteorological Journal since 1879. He was born in 1848 and received his scientific education at the University of Michigan, graduating in 1868. In 1871 he became astronomical aid of the U. S. Coast Survey on the coast of Alaska. On his return he acted as instructor in the biological department. In 1876 Professor Harrington went to Europe, spending two years of earnest study at German universities. While abroad he was offered the chair of astronomy and mathematics in the School of the Chinese Foreign Office at Peking. As director of the observatory there he introduced the first large telescope into China. In 1878 he became professor of biological science at the Louisiana State University and in the year following he entered the position which he has held up to the present date. He is the author of numerous papers and pamphlets and compiled an almanac for the Chinese government.

The Democratic Backbone.

The Canadians as a people laugh to scorn any idea of closer political relations with England. The whole trend of the public opinion is in the opposite direction. The most popular and influential leaders in Canada are already openly looking forward to a severance of the tie with Great Britain. The Conservative Government only retains power by a curious compound of loyalty and nationalism, which, reduced to plain English, means: Canada for the Canadians. Sir John McDonald in the discussion over the national policy, was warned by the Imperial Conservatives that a protective policy for Canada would injure the British connection; and his emphatic response was, "So much the worse for British connection." Those friends of unrestricted reciprocity who are dubbed "traitors" by the government organs retort by reminding them of Sir John's famous and popular reply to the Imperial croakers. Canadians are essentially democratic in their ideas. The English, Scotch and Irish emigrants who have built up Canada were not recruited from the aristocratic classes, and they came here disgusted with the social gulfs and poverty of Europe, with the determination to establish homes in the New World, where aristocratic and monarchical institutions would not grind them into the Slough of Despond forever.—New England Magazine.

Mr. Gladstone.

Mr. Gladstone's age makes a serious illness important, and the statement that his health requires absolute rest naturally causes deep anxiety. There are many Englishmen who still speak of the treachery of Sir Robert Peel, and who regard his repeal of the Corn Laws as a betrayal of political trust. There is, perhaps, a still larger body which formerly felt that Mr. Gladstone was the greatest, and even the grandest man in England who now denounce him as a political renegade and turncoat.

They acknowledge his extraordinary ability and accomplishment, his unsullied personal character, and his great public service. They concede that he had filled the highest place in England with a distinction recalling that of the most famous ministers, and that his mere ambition must have been amply gratified. But they think that he has thrown away his great renown, and exchanged the admiration even of his opponents for the contempt of his friends, that his fall is unprecedented and his loss irretrievable, and when they are asked for what was it done, what explains so astounding and pitiful a tragedy, the sole answer they offer is that he wanted to be Prime Minister once more.

Such an explanation for such an alleged moral suicide is wholly inadequate. In such a situation, when there are other explanations, common-sense adopts the most reasonable and most probable. The reasonable explanation is not that Mr. Gladstone changed his views in regard to Irish policy because he wished to be Prime Minister again but because he saw that another policy was the wiser policy for both countries. No man can better know than he knew the political risk for himself involved in his course. Either he was not the great man and sagacious leader that his present opponents concede him to have been, or his motive was not what they allege. It is idle to call Sir Robert Peel a traitor. The role of English worthies shows no truer patriot than he, and history will record that Mr. Gladstone merits his name of Grand Old Man by nothing more than by his endeavor to attach Ireland peacefully and amicably to the British Empire.—Harper's Weekly.

MISS DALWELL'S GHOST.

Such a perfect gem of a house as papa secured for us for the summer! It was neither too large nor too small; had flowers and trees in front and a vegetable garden at the back; was within twenty minutes' ride of the station, and yet stood in the shadow of the hills.

"It must be a terribly disagreeable soul that could not be happy there," I said to my mother as we looked the place over.

"I hope Miss Dalwell will like it," mamma said simply, stopping to lift a trailing vine that lay across the path.

Now, I may as well say it at once, that this same Miss Martha Dalwell was the bone of contention in our otherwise happy household. She was an "old maid" of about eight-and-thirty or forty perhaps. A more disagreeable, crotchety creature never lived than she, and yet mamma clung to her as though she were the very pink of perfection! That, too, when the woman had no earthly claim upon her—no right to a seat at our table or a shelter beneath our roof. She had the best of everything too—the best room, the best bed, the best chamber furniture. At the table the cream of the food found its way to her plate—the daintiest piece of fowl and the most luscious share of the fruit. All in all, Miss Dalwell was a nuisance in our house.

"Oh, mamma, Miss Dalwell is such a drag on all my happiness, such a cloud on every enjoyment."

"My dear child, Miss Dalwell is a very excellent personage, and it is most unkind of you to begrudge her the benefit of this summer's sojourn in the country."

"I don't. She's welcome to all the country on earth—all save this one little spot. I suppose she'll be here to-night and take possession of that south room with the dormer window!"

I shrugged my shoulders and tried to look the very picture of righteous indignation.

"She will come tonight, and will have the chamber with the dormer window," my mother said decidedly.

"Well, I'm glad my room's on the other side of the house, that's all!" intent on having the last word, though I couldn't have my way.

We waited tea for Miss Dalwell, who was to come a little after dark by the evening train. The house was pretty well furnished, and with the few articles of furniture which we brought with us distributed about looked quite charmingly in the soft glow of the lighted lamps. The dining room, with low windows opening into a veranda, was especially inviting.

I was watching mamma put the finishing touch to the tea table in the shape of a blue shell-like vase filled with white lilies, when the door bell sounded a peal long and loud through the house.

"It must be Miss Dalwell," mamma said, going into the hall; "but I never knew her to ring a bell like that before."

Sure enough, there was Miss Dalwell, shawls and traveling basket in hand, standing as white as a ghost.

"Oh, my dear Judith!" she began on seeing my mother, and then sat down in the veranda and began to cry.

"What has disturbed you so, Martha?" my mother said in such a beautifully cool way.

A sob was the answer.

"What is the matter, dear?" and mamma put a coaxing arm about her neck.

"I got such a fright!" my lady answered at last, gasping for breath.

Miss Dalwell frightened! I put my handkerchief over my mouth to keep from laughing outright.

"Just as I stepped into the veranda," she said, "a man sprang right up in front of me. I was looking for the door-bell, when he placed a big white hand on the knob and rang—you know just how hard he rang—and then faded right out of my sight without taking a step."

And, oh, Judith, he had that ring on his middle finger!

"Hush!" my mother said, laying a white hand upon her lips, and giving one quick look backward to Phil and me.

"You are nervous, Martha; probably the driver touched the bell for you, or it might have been the gardener."

"Spence! Has Spence white hands? and does he wear a diamond ring on his middle finger?"

"Well, never mind, dear; come in—tea is waiting for you."

But Miss Dalwell was not inclined to budge an inch. She turned her startled face full upon me, and spoke in such a scared, tremulous voice that I began straightway to pity her.

"Dear Louise, won't you look the place over, just to please me? You are not afraid of anything, are you?"

"Nothing in the world, Miss Dalwell," I answered. "Spence and I will look around."

So, in spite of my mother's warning look, I went straight to the kitchen to find the gardener.

"Come," I said; "there's fun in this. Miss Dalwell has seen a ghost. Let's go and hunt him up!"

We went out upon the gravel walks together, Spence and I, he trembling so that he could but just step, and I most keenly alive for an adventure. The moon was shining brightly, and the shrubbery and trees were not ruffled by a breath of air. I made straight for the deepest shadows, though I cannot to this day tell why I did so. There was a row of trees standing close against the wall. By the farthest one, in the extreme corner, I caught a glimpse of something white, or bright, I could not tell which, but I went directly to it, poor, scared Spence and the little house dog, Fido (who had volunteered in my service), keeping close to my heels.

"Oh, Lord, I see it; I can't go!" Spence cried of a sudden, and plumped right down in the center of a rosebush, while Fido gave a howl of fear and ran back straight to the house.

I was left alone in the field, and I may as well confess it, the position was not an agreeable one.

Well, I began walking right up to his ghostship. When lo! he was three trees ahead of me, and I had never seen him move! I started forward again, and this time caught a glimpse of a spark of light, a something like a tiny star, burning upon his hand. I stood still and looked at him. I was fully persuaded that I looked upon a form that was not of the earth earthly—a shadow without a substance.

"For whom are you looking?" No answer, but he turned a full fair face to the light, raised the hand on which the spark of fire burned and pointed to the dormer window, on which the moonlight was falling.

"Miss Dalwell?" No answer, only the silent upraised hand and the motionless figure. I began to shiver with fear. The cold perspiration gathered in beads upon my forehead, and trying to cry out, my tongue grew paralyzed. I had never fainted in my life, but now I felt a strange, dizzy sensation creeping over me. My mother met me. At the sight of her I found my senses again.

"You have seen something, Louise," she said, as she looked into my white face.

"As sure as you live, mamma, I saw a ghost, and he is after Miss Dalwell. Spence sat down in a rosebush from sheer fright, and Fido howled and took to his heels, while I alone staid till the lights were out. May we have supper now?"

The next day a party of young people from town joined us, and the disagreeable incidents of the night before were seemingly forgotten. But I noticed that Miss Dalwell moved about pale and silent. My affairs, of a sudden, seemed to have lost all charm for her. Once, in going into mamma's room, I found her crying, and on asking what the matter was, she said that she had had a bad dream.

The weeks went merrily. We became acquainted with other families in the vicinity, and spent the time in a continuous round of gaiety. Indeed, I may as well say here that our happiest hours were spent away from our own home. The atmosphere there began to grow uncanny. Under the old roof by day or night there was never unbroken quiet. Doors seemed to be always opening and shutting from unaccountable draughts; windows broke their lines and came crashing down; shutters swung to and fro when the air was still; dishes rattled down in their places, and nothing seemed to rest upon a secure foundation about the house.

"Look here, Aunt Judith," Cousin Frank began one morning at the breakfast table, "I believe there is a ghost about this house that needs laying. I looked my door on going to bed last night, but this morning when I awoke I found it wide open."

"That's nothing," Letty Gray exclaimed. "Mine has served me that trick more than once. I haven't thought of being afraid."

"Who said anything of fear, Miss Letty?"

"I think Louise would if she could speak," Frank answered quickly, springing up from the table and dashing a glass of water in my face.

It brought me to my senses just as they were failing me. Close to Miss Dalwell's chair I had seen a figure standing, the same that I had seen weeks before in the shadow of the trees.

"Be so kind as to let this foolish talk drop," my mother said, and immediately began to talk eloquently of a book which she had been reading.

As I left the table Miss Dalwell whispered in my ear. "You saw him again?"

"Yes."

"By my chair?"

"By your chair!"

"Come out in the garden with me," she said, putting an arm about my waist. "I want to tell you something. This man has not come here to harm you; I alone draw him hither. Years ago he was my lover, one whom I rejected for what I thought a good cause. I had worn his ring, and returned it to him. He died a short time after, but before his death wrote me a letter, in which he said that, above or below, on earth or in heaven, that ring should be worn on my finger again. That is all. What will come of it God only knows, but day and night I am haunted as though I were guilty of some fearful crime!"

"Poor Miss Dalwell," I said pityingly. But a moment after, looking into her eyes, I felt sure that I had been listening to the story of a crazy woman. Only, with my own eyes, I had seen the face that haunted her.

Another week wore away. There was the usual small commotion about the place. Spence had gone back to town because he could not stand it, while the cook and housemaid both slept upon the floor of a night in my mother's room. All in all, the unpleasantness was growing a little too strong for comfort.

But one night the end came. It was moonlight again, and outside not a breeze stirred the foliage. We were sitting in groups on the wide veranda. In the parlor Miss Wilde was striking minor chords upon the piano, while Cousin Frank, in a voice modulated to suit the hour, was going through with the "Ancient Mariner." He was repeating these words:

An orphan's curse would drag to hell A spirit from on high;

But oh, more horrible than that Is the curse in a dead man's eye!

Seven days, seven nights—

when from Miss Dalwell's lips arose such a shriek that our blood curdled in our veins. It was followed by a second's silence, then my mother sprang to her side. She lay back in her chair, stark and still, her eyes set in fright, her jaw fallen. Not a word was spoken, but each one of that terrified group saw upon the fourth finger of her left hand a golden circlet with a diamond burning in its center. The poor creature wore her lover's ring at last.

All was useless. Miss Dalwell was dead!

Years have passed since that night, and in looking back to it through the softening mists of time, I cannot but wonder whether or no my mother's friend was a sane woman. Be that as it may, I tell you the "ower true tale" as I experienced it.—New York World.

LITERARY NOTES.

The literary event of the summer in the United States will be the publication in the Cosmopolitan Magazine of a short novel by Amelle Rives, which she calls "According to St. John." It is said to be the strongest work from the pen that produced "A Brother to Dragons" and "The Quick or the Dead." Its publication in the Cosmopolitan is a guarantee that it will contain nothing of the kind that excited criticism in Miss Rives' earlier productions. During her two years' residence abroad, Mrs. Chanler has written nothing else for the public, and this product of her matured mind may be expected to register with something like exactness, this author's position in the world of letters.

We are always glad to chronicle a new idea, especially when it is possessed of such great merit as that which is now presented to us in the August number of Demorest's Family Magazine, which has just arrived. One of the leading articles is a game of baseball all played out on paper by means of finely executed illustrations with explicit descriptions of each move. Those who have attempted to explain the game of baseball to a sister, wife or wife-to-be, know what an almost hopeless task it was. Now here is the whole thing done for you, and so cleverly and clearly that after reading it a woman will be as anxious as any one of the other sex to see a match, and she will never again say, "Well! what is there in baseball, anyhow?" The article will save you hours of explanation, and shows the enterprise of this progressive Magazine, which strives to give the public just what they want. This August number is certainly very attractive. "A Happy Day at Cairo," with its beautiful illustrations, gives a splendid idea of home life in Egypt; "Summer's Bird" is one of Olive Thorne Miller's charming papers; "The Game of Lawn Croquet" describes the new pastime that is almost as fascinating as tennis; There are absorbing stories and beautiful poems; all the numerous departments are overflowing with good and seasonable things; and in addition there are over two hundred fine illustrations, including a beautiful water-color of "Swallows." It is published by W. Jennings Demorest, at 15 East 14th St., N. Y. Price 20 cents; or $2 per year. Any of our local news-dealers will be glad to supply it.

A smaller page, clearer and more readable type, an artistic cover without advertising matter, a large increase in the number of pages, ampler and better illustrations, greater attention throughout to distinctively beautiful typography—these are the characteristics most prominent in The Christian Union of July 4, which begins the forty-fourth volume, and marks a striking new departure in the history of that popular and successful family paper. This issue contains sixty-eight pages, a large number of admirable illustrations, including a superb portrait of Phillips Brooks, and its literary contents are such as make it of the greatest value in every intelligent home.

The new Fashion Journals, "La Mode," "La Mode de Paris," and "Album des Modes," published by A. McDowell & Co., 4 West 14th Street, New York, are the most elegant of their kind ever brought to

The amount owing by the parties who have failed in 1891 footing up to $92,000,000, while for the same period in 1890 they were only $65,000,000, showing an increase in liabilities of $27,000,000.

Mail Service.

Scattered through the New England States are less than five hundred railway postal clerks. These include office clerks in charge of lines, examining clerks, stenographers, substitutes, etc. Few occupations are more hazardous, very few more arduous than that of a clerk on one of our Trunk Lines. The number killed and injured annually is proportionally greater than a like loss during the civil war. This seems incredible but the statement was recently made and authenticated by one of the most reliable papers in the country. To become successful as a clerk requires a vast amount of hard study of the dryest and most uninteresting nature. His peculiar labor compels him to spend most of the time away from home, and a large outlay for personal expenses becomes necessary. Many are obliged to do their share while most people are asleep. For all this, the railway postal clerk is the poorest paid of government officials. His salary ranges from $800, at which rate he is paid for the first six months of his service, to $1,300, the salary of a clerk in charge of a car. In case a clerk is injured while on duty, he is allowed his salary while disabled, but only for one year, at the end of which time, if he is unable to continue, his place is filled and he is dropped from the pay roll. Should death overtake him as the result of an accident, his loss and that of his income to his family are simultaneous, no provision being made for such cases by the government.

During the last session of Congress a bill was introduced by the clerks for a small increase of salary. Though the bill had the approval of the Department, it never came up for passage, the request being lost sight of in the many and greater demands from every other source. A more determined effort is promised for the future. The clerks all through the country are organizing and a bill will probably be prepared for the next Congress, and doubtless the clerks will be heard. Their appeal is a most just one, as a close observation of their statistics will evidence. Silent argument will be offered by the six departed heroes who were suddenly and sadly relieved from duty a short time since in that dire Ohio collision. This seems a year of fatality to clerks, though a grim petition, may bring success to the clerks in their efforts for recognition at Congress. The salary list in force today is one adopted in 1874. In the meantime the service has improved in every sense, but the pay is as it was for the old service.

The clerks of the first division met at the Quincy House, Boston, this week, and perfected an organization, approved and sustained by the officials.

As the sun is superior to the stars, so DANA'S is superior to all other Sarsaparillas.

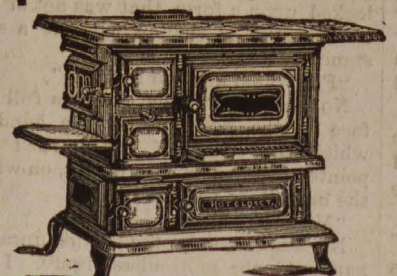

Fire at Danvers.

At 1.30 o'clock Tuesday, fire was discovered in the house on Sylvan street, Danvers, the first house over the line from Peabody. The house was occupied by Mary L. Pike, the owner, and Albert Trask, and the fire started in the chimney of the part occupied by the tenant. An alarm was given in Peabody which was responded to, and although beyond the limits, Engineer J. H. Tibbetts co-operated with the Danvers department and the building was saved from total destruction. The interior was badly burned, entailing a loss of about $1000. The insurance carried by the South Danvers Mutual amounted to $1700. The Danvers hose being in a delapidated condition the brunt of fight fell on the Peabody Hose company.

TITUS & BUCKLEY'S Complete House Furnishing Emporium.

What is an Emporium? What goes into its make up? Why the term? The term at once suggests something large. A business conducted on an extensive scale. A mart of trade where everything of a special branch or several branches of a particular line are gathered together under one head. Such a combination properly managed affords at once immense advantages over single department stores. Advantages in the way of trading with one salesman. Buying your goods at one place. Quicker service. Contracting a single bill in place of three or four. And lower prices ALWAYS from the fact that the items of expense in running such a store are made smaller in a dozen ways. Such is our Emporium, and its popularity is best attested by our constantly increasing trade. Remember that we have four floors fully stocked with GOODS THAT SELL.

We shall probably never sell clubs again, their day having gone by, but there are many who do not care during these dull times to pay so much as $5.00 a dozen for pictures, but who still want the best. As we wish to reach this class, but do not believe in charging two prices for the same thing, we have decided to adopt the medium price of $4.00 for a short time. The quality of work will be the same as heretofore.

Official Report on the Wallis and Center Schools.

The State Inspectors make the following report as a result of their inspection of the Wallis and Center school houses: "We find nothing to lead us to think that the Centre school building is unsafe. The floor of the staircase hall in the Wallis school house is in part supported by a truss in the partition across said hall and this floor is considerably deflected under this truss. We recommend that this floor be carefully raised with jackscrews, so as to crown slightly on the line of the truss, and the bolts of the truss set up so as to hold it in position. If there are any defects in the truss or the supports, this action will be likely to disclose them, but the truss will be found we think sufficient to sustain any weight likely to be imposed upon it."

The Board of Trade Outing.

The full details of the proposed outing by the Salem Board of Trade on Wednesday of next week are announced.

Accommodations will be provided only for those who procure tickets on or before Monday next July 27. The price will be 75 cents for each person. Parties can go by Gloucester Branch train, by private carriages, or by the Cove, street cars. The party will rendezvous on Washington and Lynde streets. The start will be made at 2 P. M. sharp. The drive proposed includes Beverly lookout, Salem reservoir and the Salem pumping station. The leader has timed it as to arrive at the corner of Colon street and Brimble avenue, near Montserrat station, at 2 30 P. M. and await any passengers who desire to join the party at this point for the remaining drive.

The return drive will be to the residence of Mr. Henry W. Peabody. A brief half-hour for strolling to some of the picturesque spots which surround the residence, will be given, and at 6 P. M. the lunch will be served.

During the lunch an orchestra will render choice selections, and at the close a brief interchange of courtesies and remarks may be expected. Tickets must be secured by members on or before July 27.—Salem Gazette.

A Peabody Man's Disgrace.

James E. Trask was arrested on Thursday charged with embezzlement of $200 from Edson & Co., by whom he was employed for the past fifteen or eighteen months. When arraigned before Judge Merrill yesterday morning he pleaded guilty, and furnished sureties in the sum of $500 for appearance before the Grand Jury in October.

In 1877, Mr. Trask, then a promising youth not yet 21 years old, purchased a provision store on Main street that had been conducted by Farnham Bros., and did a thriving business; but dreaming of large profits from the wholesale pork business, he sold the retail store and purchased the Goodridge farm on Lynnfield street, next to Craig's mill, which he made headquarters for his new enterprise. He had, at one time, several wagons on the road and appeared to flourish, but various causes led to financial embarrassment, and he struggled for months under the weight of numerous heavy mortgages and floating debts and finally surrendered his property and started a small retail provision store in Lynn. Habits had been formed however while in the wholesale trade, that rendered him incapable of attending to his business as he should and this enterprise soon petered out, after which he entered the employ of N. W. Edson & Co., driving a team from their branch store in town. It was the collections made on his route in the latter capacity that he is charged with peculating.

He belongs to a well known family and has a wife and several children who are entitled to much sympathy in the distressing situation caused by his disgrace.

Hanover's Murder.

Frank C. Almy who is charged with the murder of Miss Christie Warden, at Hanover N. H., seems to have been well known in this vicinity. Having worked for Mr. James Wilkins in this town, and for Mr. Howe of Danvers. He also worked for a time in Salem where he made some acquaintance, and was known in Marblehead. He is spoken of by all, as intelligent, being above the average of farm hands but of an ungenial disposition. After he left the employ of Mr. Wilkins he returned several times and importuned to secure him a situation on the ranch of a son in Texas, which however was not done.

He has led his pursuers on a long chase and it is now thought he has gone across the Atlantic, possibly on his way to England. There is however, great uncertainty as to his whereabouts. A reward of $1000 is offered for his capture. Those who know him here say the portrait published in the daily papers is a very poor likeness.

Matrimonial.

On Thursday evening a quiet wedding occurred at the residence of George A. Goldthwaite, between his daughter Cora (A.), and John D. McKeen. The ceremony was performed in the presence of a few friends and the immediate relatives by Rev. W. P. Ray of the Methodist church. After the ceremony the couple departed on a tour to New York and Washington.

Presents were numerous and beautiful. Among the gifts were a silver service from the Trustees of Peabody Institute of which institution Mr. McKeen has served faithfully as janitor for eleven years, two handsome pieces presents by the managers of the Sutton Home, an elegant French clock from William F. Sawyer, by whom the bride had been employed for a long time. The clerks at Sawyer's store also remembered the happy pair very substantially.

Upon their return they will reside in the Institute house on Wallis street.

Cattle Show and Fair.

The fair of the Essex Agricultural Society will be held this year at Lawrence, on Tuesday and Wednesday, Sept. 22 and 23. The free show of cattle, etc., will be in tents on South Union street, while the fruit, vegetables and industrial exhibition will be held at City Hall, to which an admission fee of twenty-five cents will be charged. Col. Melvin Beal of Lawrence has been selected as chief marshal for the occasion.

Tuesday, Sept. 22, at 10 A. M., the society, committees and marshals meet at the court house, for filling vacancies in committees, and other business. At 11 A. M. the society at the same place will choose a president, four vice presidents, and secretary for one year. At 1 P. M. the trial of draft cattle and farm horses will take place on Salem street. Wednesday, Sept. 23, Ploughing match on land on South Broadway, south of the B. & M. R. R. station, at 10 A. M. At 11 30 A. M. the annual address before the society by William H. Moody, Esq., of Haverhill, in Trinity church, Haverhill street; immediately after which the annual dinner will be served in Porter's hall, Lawrence street, followed by speeches from prominent gentlemen and the transaction of remaining business of the society in confirming awards, etc.

Essex County Prohibitionists.

The Essex County Prohibition Club held its interesting quarterly meeting in Hope Chapel, Salisbury Beach, on Wednesday last. Rev. J. F. Spalding of Salisbury led the devotional service at 10 15. Brief speeches were made by Rev. Mr. Beane of New Hampshire, Rev. Messrs. Seaver, Howard, Wilson and Fulson, also by Mr. Cole of Wenhams, Mr. Cassino and Samuel Trask, of this town.

At the afternoon session Miss Merrill, an evangelist from Boston, led the devotional service, after which Mr. J. R. Bartlett presented the kindly greetings at the Worcester Weekly Times. Rev. Mr. Williams, president of the club, having arrived, a cordial greeting in behalf of the club, was given to him by Rev. Mr. Seaver. The president gave many interesting incidents in connection with his journey to the Holy Land.

Poem of welcome, written by Mrs. Annie S. Perkins of Lynnfield Centre, was then read by Miss Jennie Haskell of Newburyport.

An able address by Willard O. Wyle of Beverly, followed, which was listened to with great interest.

Rev. Mr. Spaulding defended the President by saying that he had to make his appointments out of such material as he had. He must use such timber as the party provides—he did the best he could under the circumstances. A discussion followed.

LOCAL LINES.

We regret to record the death of Mrs. Susan, widow of the late Samuel Cheever. Her death occurred at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. Eliza S. Osborn, at Boston, on Wednesday. Her age was 86 years and 2 months. Services will be held at the grave in Monumental Cemetery at 2 30 o'clock to-day. The deceased was a resident of the town until 1885 and had numerous relatives here, among whom were the late Mrs. Eliza Sutton and Mrs. Serena Ayers. She leaves a son, John O. Cheever, and one daughter, with whom she she had lived. She was the oldest member of the Unitarian church.

Miss Lizzie Kelley fell from a Naumkeag electric car late Thursday evening on the upper part of Boston street, receiving a severe bruise on the head. She was stepping off when the car started, which threw her headlong on the ground.

As an out of door entertainment the grand spectacle "The New Pompeii" which is now on its third week of unexampled success on the Pompeian Ground, Huntington avenue, Boston, never has been surpassed and certainly for novel features, both amusing and instructive, Pompeii has never been equalled either in Boston or elsewhere. The Boston Herald says truthfully "The show appeals to all classes, and to big and little with equal interest. Those who miss it fail to see one of the best out of door entertainments ever given in Boston." Says the Boston Globe "No matter how warm it is in Boston there is always comfort at the vast amphitheatre, and the street car arrangements enable one to go in and out with ease and speed." Improvements and new features are being constantly added, and the spectacle takes on new beauties with each performance, so that it is not to be wondered at that hundreds are so delighted with Pompeii that they go the third and fourth time to see it. As the management truthfully advertise "Pompeii is the most gorgeous out of door entertainment ever given in Boston. It is more than they claim "Three shows in one." The grand scenic tableau of the destruction of the ancient city, the beautiful ballet with new dances and charming steps, the wonderful athletic performance on track and arena, the exciting chariot races on a mammoth track, the gladiatorial combats and Roman sports of 18 centuries ago, combined with the choruses, marches and the magnificent fireworks display give no reason to wonder that Pompeii is just at present resort for the amusement loving public.

North Shore.

Messrs. Benjamin D. Hill and Winfield S. Nevins have just issued their thirteenth edition of "The North Shore of Massachusetts Bay." The work appears in its familiar form, but with several valuable additions to text and pages of illustrations. Under Peabody, some interesting paragraphs appear for the first time, notably the reference to Rev. Benjamin Prescott's mansion, while he occupied the parsonate of the middle precinct. The house is numbered 72 Central street, and was built for the parson and his wife, a sister of Governor Pepperrell, in 1739. The old elm in front of George W. Pepper's confectionery establishment will readily be recognized by any who have ever seen that ancient tree, and the view of the Standard Thermometer Works is quite realistic.

To the stranger visiting this section, this book furnishes an admirable index to the wealth of historical and natural attractions in which Essex County abounds, while to residents, a brief history is furnished of familiar sights. The book can be purchased at the stores of the publishers at twenty-five cents per copy.

William McNamair, who was arrested as a deserter from the White Squadron, on account of a resemblance of his yachting suit to the garb of the squadron's crew, will sue the Admiral for false arrest. Gen. B. F. Butler will be retained.

Beware of Ointments for Catarrh that contain Mercury,

as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury and can be taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure he is sure to get the genuine. It is taken internally, and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co. Sold by all druggists, price 75c per bottle.

THE MELVILLE MURDER

COPYRIGHT BY AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION, 1891.

Until I saw Richard Melville there, in the custody of the officers and on the way to a cell, I never knew what the expression "insane fury" meant. His eyes glared like those of a wild beast, and seemed starting from their sockets; his face was deadly pale and terribly contorted. He struggled with the strength of an athlete against his captors; had he been but for one moment free, I think he would have conquered them both and made his escape.

After a prolonged struggle the officers half forced and half carried him down the rear stairway to the cell room. Such scenes were not uncommon in the court room, and I went on with my writing. But I could not help hearing bystanders talk as I worked.

"He ought to get a year for that," said one.

"It was a brutal thing to do."

"What was it?"

"Why, this gentleman prisoner the justice just let off scot free killed the office dog before he got out of the building."

"And the way he did it!" broke in another voice.

"How?"

"Why, the poor creature was going down the iron stairs just ahead of him. Without a word of warning he clutched the hand rail to prevent falling and sprang upon the poor pet with both his great feet, crushing its life out over the edge of the iron stairs. He wasn't satisfied with that. He stood there and ground his heavy heels into the dead body until I believe there wasn't a whole bone left in it. Then he became stark, raving mad, and struck out right and left until the officers came. The cut on his head came from a fall on the stairs. The captain says it is over an old wound and may prove serious."

"Wonder what they'll do with him?"

"Send him to an asylum."

"Oh, he's crazy all right enough."

I was getting weary of the talk and went into my private office. The bailiff followed me in.

"Say," he said, almost in a whisper, "that was Maurice Green."

"Pshaw!"

"Well, I have seen Maurice Green have spells like that. He was the most brutal man I ever knew—the quickest to shed blood and the quickest to go into a frenzy at the sight of it. People who knew the family in Maine declare that there were murderers among his ancestors. Bad blood will out, eh?"

I was beginning to take more than a passing interest in the case. At the ten o'clock session of court I asked the captain what had been done with Richard Melville.

"Oh," was the reply, "his friends took him away. I guess he has been drinking too much lately."

CHAPTER XVIII.

CONTRIBUTED BY THE FAMILY PHYSICIAN.

"I will speak louder. Write it down."

I remember being called to a police station in the Eastern District of Brooklyn to take charge of Richard Melville.

I found him suffering, first, from a species of nervous fever, which had pushed him almost to the verge of insanity, and second, from a severe wound on the head. As it was quite probable that he would be worse before he was better I caused him to be removed to a neighboring hotel and employed competent nurses.

When I came to examine the wound closely I found that it occupied almost exactly the position of the wound I had treated for him in the Virginia farmhouse. The skull was fractured at the exact spot where it had been fractured by the explosion in the hospital. The case was a serious one, and I saw that a very delicate operation was absolutely necessary.

Then the scenes and incidents in the Virginia farmhouse came back to my mind. I remembered that for weeks after the fever had abated my patient had struggled with a sluggish brain; that all his life up to the minute of the accident was a blank to him, and only came back by piecemeal and after the most persistent tutorage on the part of his mother and myself.

In view of this fact I had not regarded the treatment of the case exactly as a success, although I did not blame myself at all, having taken hold of it after the original operation. It is needless to say that I did not desire to undertake the case alone. In an hour's time I was in consultation with one of the best surgeons in the state.

"I am not certain," I explained to him, "that the previous wound was properly cared for. You, who were consulted immediately upon his return to New York, know what shape his mind was in for years. Now I want to put a question to you:

"If the brain was left in bad shape by the operation in Virginia, is it possible to remedy that by the operation which must now take place?"

"No one can tell," was the reply.

The secret lies behind those pieces of shattered bone. If we do our work well it is possible that we may send him out into the world a brighter man than he has been since the accident in the hospital."

"And with the memories of his early life fully restored?"

The surgeon shook his head. "I can't tell," he replied, "as I said before the secret lies behind those pieces of broken bone. No one can tell at this time whether the brain was left in a condition of pressure or irritation or not."

I had my own ideas about these having been a pressure on the patient's brain ever since that night in the hospital, but I kept them to myself. In regard to irritation of the brain I was not so positive.

As soon as the patient had been reduced to a condition of insensibility we proceeded with the operation, completing it as rapidly as possible and without comment.

"I can answer one of your questions now," the surgeon said, putting away his instruments.

"Well?"

"You asked if a mistake made at the first operation could be corrected now. I say yes."

"Then you mean that?"

"One has already been corrected. The man has not been himself all these years because of a lack of skill on the part of the hospital surgeon. Let me explain. I am told that it is not necessary for me to give here the technical explanation of the case I received from the surgeon, so I proceed to record what followed.

"In my opinion," continued the surgeon, "the man will now rapidly and naturally outgrow the effects of the hospital surgeon's botchwork. I await the moment of his regaining consciousness with a great deal of anxiety."

Before this took place Mrs. Clark Melville and Mr. Charles Gates entered the room, and for the second time Mrs. Clark Melville and myself waited in silence for the first intelligible words from the sufferer's lips.

They were a long time coming.

When they did come Mrs. Melville was standing by the window looking out into the street, her kind old face looking more careworn than I had ever seen it before. At the time I was sitting close beside the sufferer, and I alone heard the first words that came from his lips.

They were repeated faintly several times, and then the patient seemed to drop into a state of unconsciousness closely bordering on sleep.

I remember now that I sat for a moment like one in a trance. The words I had heard seemed to deprive me of all power of speech or motion. The first thought that did come to my mind was of Mrs. Clark Melville.

She must be removed from the room before another word escaped the patient's lips. But how?

At last I used the only means in my power. I used my authority as her family physician.

"Mrs. Melville," I said, "it may be hours before your son regains consciousness. I hope so, at all events, for every hour now gives increased strength. In the meantime you must return home and rest—sleep, if you can, but at least rest."

"But I can neither sleep nor rest with Richard lying here," she said, the tears starting into her eyes.

"You cannot help him; you can only injure yourself. I even doubt the wisdom of allowing him to see you when he first regains consciousness."

"You are sending me away for a purpose," said the old lady sadly. "Tell me what it is."

"I am sending you away in the interest of your son's health and your own. You may, if you desire, allow Mr. Gates to remain here, so that you may at once be notified of any change."

With this trifling consolation the noble old lady took her departure. The door had hardly closed upon her retreating figure when the sufferer found his tongue again.

I congratulated the surgeon upon the success of his operation as I bade him adieu at the door, dismissed the attendants, gave Officer Gates some whispered instructions, and sat down by the sufferer alone to await developments.

In half an hour Detective Gates entered in company with a heavily veiled lady and an officer in uniform.

The veiled lady was Caroline Green. The officer in uniform was a man sent to escort her to and from the station house.

I placed her where she could hear the first words that came from his lips without being seen, and again sat down to wait.

The patient came out of a light sleep and opened his eyes. His first words were:

"I am glad you got me away from the hospital. We were cold and hungry there."

When he spoke Mrs. Green's eyes filled with tears. She had heard that exact tone many years before.

"I asked you to write me a letter when I awoke before. Did you do it?"

I shook my head.

"I couldn't catch the address. Your voice is so weak."

"I will speak louder. Write it down: 'Mrs. Caroline Green, Clifton, Maine.' She is my wife. We were married the day before I joined my regiment. Tell her I am hurt, and will write as soon as I am able."

Mrs. Green fell sobbing on her knees, and was about to speak, when I raised a warning finger and pointed significantly to the mirror.

CHAPTER XIX.

CONTRIBUTED BY CAROLINE GREEN.

When the family physician warned me to be silent, and directed my attention to the mirror, there was no need for explanation. What he meant to say was that Maurice would not then recognize me as the young wife he had left in Maine.

"For all I know," he said to me a few moments later, when Maurice had again lost himself in a light sleep, "his life may be a blank from the time of the explosion in the hospital up to the present moment. You saw yourself that his first recollection was connected with the hospital—that he remembered the cold and the short rations there before he recalled the events of yesterday and today, as important as they were. My opinion now is that he is not responsible for the acts of yesterday and today; that he cannot be held accountable for any act of his own for the past seven years."

I fell upon my knees before the physician and asked and begged of him, again and again, to repeat what he had said.

"Why," he said with a kind smile, "you can rest assured that your husband will not cast you off now. You saw that his first thoughts were of you. I sincerely believe that your husband believed himself to be Richard Melville."

"Now go back to your room at the station house."

and Caroline Green to be an impostor. There, you must go away now. The sight of your gray hair and careworn face would do him no good. He must come gradually to know the length of time that has elapsed since he was taken from the hospital. He must get a good many things into his head before he sees his wife. Now go back to your room at the station house and sleep some of the care lines out of your face; you may come here again tomorrow. You will meet Mrs. Clark Melville then. Poor old lady! So it was Richard Melville who was buried in Virginia after all! I am afraid this will break her heart!"

"Is it necessary that she should know?" I asked.

The physician shook his head. "Your husband will talk of nothing, think of nothing but Maine and his young wife," he said, "and will be a stranger in New York. Yes, she must be told."

Officer Gates came to where we were standing and laid his hand on the physician's shoulder.

"I have arranged for that," he said, "only I must have a little time; and Mrs. Green will oblige me by writing down what has taken place here today, and anything else that she may think of interest."

I knew what he meant before he had ceased speaking, and the thought filled me with a sudden fear.

He must have noticed my agitation, for he said kindly:

"Your narrative will not be entirely new to me, Mrs. Green. I know pretty well what it will contain; and I may add now that you will help yourself and your friends in every way by telling the exact truth. I will call in the morning for the manuscript."

At the station house I met Mrs. Clark Melville.

"You have seen my son," she said. "Tell me about him. Is he in his right mind? Will he live?"

I replied that he was sleeping when I left, and that the physician believed his recovery to be only a question of time.

"What mystery is there between you?" she demanded. "Why do they exclude the mother from the room, and admit?"

She stopped short and rested her face on her hand a moment.

"There," she said, "I was wrong in losing my temper. I am satisfied that it is all for the best. I came here to become security for your appearance when wanted. I am told, however, that bail cannot be taken until a formal complaint is made, and not even then if a charge of murder is preferred. You may rest assured that everything possible will be done for you. Have you said to any one else what you said to me in the captain's office yesterday?"

I had not, and I told her so. How I longed to throw myself at her feet and tell her everything! I should have done so only for Officer Gates' warning.

And now, how shall I write down what must be written?

I am positive that Mr. Charles Gates knew nearly every point of my story before he asked me to write it down. If I thought otherwise I should not write it.

But then, there is some comfort in what the physician said. I wonder if his opinion would have weight in a court of law?

Well, I did not see the blow struck, but I know who murdered my poor brother.

Maurice Green killed him at a time when he was not responsible for his actions. At least that's what Mrs. Clark Melville's family physician says. He ought to know. In order to prove my statement that he was not responsible for his acts it is only necessary for me to refer to one circumstance of the case. He believed himself to be another person. At the time of the killing he was protecting what he believed to be the rights of that other person. That other person was Richard Melville, who was killed by the explosion which sent Maurice Green back into the world with a new name and a deformed mind. So affected was his mind by the wound and the unskillful manner in which it was cared for that he did not even know me!

Another thing, and this will show more than anything else how weak his mind was. He was stricken down with a pretty picture of a happy and luxurious New York home before his eyes; with tales of a petted and fondled existence from the cradle to the army lingering in and exciting his mind; with the names of Richard Melville's friends and associates fresh in his mind. His brain was full of these things when the explosion came.

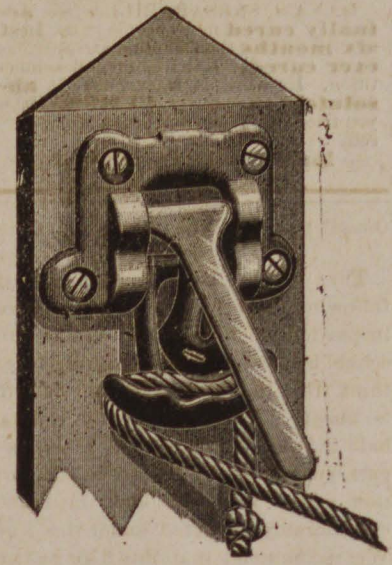

Is it any wonder, then, that when—time and time again—Mrs. Clark Mel-

Books Made of Clay.

Far away beyond the plains of Mesopotamia, on the banks of the River Tigris, lie the ruins of the ancient City Nineveh. Not long since high mounds of earth and stone marked the place where the palaces and walls of the proud capital of the great Assyrian Empire stood. The spade and scraper, first of the French and then of the English, have cleared all the earth away and laid bare all that remains of the old streets and palaces where the proud princes of Assyria walked and lived. The gods they worshiped and the books they read have all been revealed to the sight of a wondering world. The most curious of all curious things preserved in this wonderful manner are the clay books of Nineveh. The chief library of this city was contained in the palace of Kanyunjik. The clay books which composed its contents were sets of tablets covered with very small letters. The tablets are all oblong in shape, and when several of them are used for one book the first line of the tablet following was written at the end of the one proceeding it. The writing was done when the clay of the tablet was soft; it was then baked to harden it. Each tablet was numbered just as librarians of today number the books of which they have charge. Among these books are to be found collections of hymns, descriptions of animals and birds, stones and vegetables, as well as of history and travel. The Assyrians were great students of astronomy. The method of telling time by the sun and of marking it by the sun-dial was either invented by them or their neighbors, the Babylonians. None of our modern clocks or watches can be compared with the sun-dial for accuracy. Indeed, we regulate our modern inventions by the ancient Assyrian and Babylonian system.—American Bookbinder.

ville and her family physician brought back these incidents and these names to awaken what they believed to be a slushy memory—is it any wonder, I say, that under such circumstances he should have mistaken the things which were last in his mind for actual occurrences? Why, they told him in so many words that these things were a part of his former life, and that he would be laughed out of his set if he went back to New York with an intellect too stupid to recollect old scenes and old friends. With all of his own early life blotted out by a diseased brain, is it any wonder that he believed all they said, and laid hold of the fragments of the life that had belonged to Richard Melville? I would like to know just how many of the recollections of that early life were learned, word by word, from the lips of Mrs. Melville?

I was a servant in the Melville house before he had been back from the army three months, and I knew how he acted then. He wandered from room to room handling and examining the many dainty things with which the house was crowded with the air of a man who had never seen the like before. Maurice Green came from the backwoods and ate with his knife. The new Richard Melville ate with his knife! I remember how shocked Mrs. Melville was at first, but she laid it to the army.

I remember how, for days and days, Mrs. Melville sat with him in a position to see callers before they entered the house. That is why he was able to call them by name when they took him by the hand. Was Mrs. Melville honest in all this? I am certain that she was. You see he remembered the things Richard Melville was telling when the explosion came. That was enough for a fond mother to start on, wasn't it? And then she did not know what was taking place when her son was killed.

One thing puzzled her. The old Richard Melville's temper was completely under control. The new Richard Melville frequently indulged in bursts of passion which were sometimes more than brutal. I admit that Maurice Green had that kind of a temper, but he never allowed it to affect me. It was in one of these attacks of insanity that my brother was killed. I know, because I was in the carriage house and heard the words and the blow.

It is said that there were murderers in the earlier generations of my husband's family, and that had blood will tell. I don't believe it. The act my husband committed would have been committed by the most gentle of persons under the same circumstances. The army surgeon ought to be held responsible for them. Send a man into the world—and a new and false world at that—with an irritated and diseased brain, and what won't he do?

I depend upon the evidence of medical experts to acquit my husband. If he dies I shall die with him. A thousand hells could not be more unbearable than the life I have lived for years. I mean to have my picture—just as I looked when we were married—shown to him tomorrow. I wonder if he will recognize it? He did not know it when I showed it to him after he came back from the hospital. Think of that. His own wife's picture, and taken in her wedding dress! But then he recollected nothing about Clifton or his friends there. When I called the place by name and described it to him—even the place where he had lived—he paid no more attention to it than he would had his attention been called to a place in China. But that, thank God, is all past now. The condition of mind that made him for the time being Richard Melville, in the end brought him back to me as Maurice Green!

CHAPTER XX.
CONTRIBUTED BY CHARLES GATES.
In a moment the manuscript was burning in the grate.
It is an old saying that if you want anything well done you must do it yourself. The people who have brought me their manuscripts have not closed up the case to my satisfaction.
For instance, Mrs. Caroline Green knew that the man who murdered her brother was secreted in the closet at the time when the officers and the servants were in the room viewing the body, but she does not say so. She even stood by the closet door in order that the noise she made might conceal his heavy breathing. That is a tough place to put a woman, isn't it? A wife shielding her husband, who has disowned her, from the murder of her brother, who was killed in her behalf! No wonder the poor thing was accused of being insane. In all my criminal experience I never met anything exactly like that.
And then, again, both the hospital steward and the keeper of the dead house knew of the striking resemblance between Richard Melville and Maurice Green. It was so great that it deceived the mother and the family physician, still they refer to it very lightly.
Then why should Mrs. Caroline Green gloss over her husband's evil temper? Perhaps she realizes that she is under obligations to that same hasty temper, for only for the taint of bad blood in the Green family, and that cheap backwoods passion of Maurice Green, the new Richard Melville would have walked through the world as the old Richard Melville until the end of his days, and there would never have been a Maurice Green. Only for that murderer in the coachman's room no one would have ever known that Richard Melville was buried in Virginia in place of Maurice Green, and that Maurice Green picked up the life of Richard Melville where he laid it down.

And I don't understand why Mrs. Green does not explain her motive for inducing her husband—at that time Richard Melville—to aid her in escaping from the asylum. Well, she can do as she pleases, but I shall always believe that she would have been murdered that night if the carriage had not met with an accident on Twenty-third street, for he knew that she was acquainted with all the facts of her brother's death. The foolish woman had used that to him as an argument why he should accept her as his wife, and in doing so had imperiled her own life.

That would have made two murders for Mr. Maurice Green, alias Richard Melville—one committed to protect his position in the Melville family, and the other committed to conceal the first. Now, I have consulted the prosecuting officers of the county and half a dozen medical experts, and without exception all express the opinion that it would be useless to put Maurice Green on trial for the murder committed in the name of Richard Melville. It would be, they say, like trying a man for an offense committed in his sleep or during the frenzy of a brain fever. All accept the conclusion arrived at; all have pledged themselves to secrecy for Mrs. Clark Melville's sake, and Mrs. Caroline Green has already been released from custody. I am told that she went straight to her husband at the Brooklyn hotel, and that he recognized her in spite of her faded and changed appearance. It is with him as the surgeon predicted. His New York life is as much of a blank to him now as his life in Maine was before. Mrs. Clark Melville is still in ignorance of the true state of affairs. She will know that the man she has cared for so unselfishly is not her son for the first time when she reads the history of my investigation in the manuscripts I have had prepared for her.

I don't like the looks of the thing! I believe from the bottom of my heart that Maurice Green is responsible for the murder he has committed. I have no doubt that Maurice Green believed himself to be Richard Melville. Such cases are, I am told, not rare in the books. It is certain, too, that he was honest in rejecting the claims of his wife.

Now to arrange the manuscripts and deliver them to Mrs. Melville. Perhaps I shall see Mrs. Caroline Green there. If I do I shall ask her to explain her motive in leaving the asylum. I already know what her companion's motive was in taking her away.

What will Mrs. Clark Melville say? There, I have seen Mrs. Clark Melville, and she has read the manuscripts. She now knows the truth. How did she receive it? Let me write down what took place.

When I rang the bell I was told that Mrs. Melville had been expecting me all day, and was shown into her private sitting room, where I found her alone. I laid my manuscript on the table. "You have brought your report in writing," she said, turning paler than usual with excitement. "Come back in two hours and you shall know what to do next. Stop," she added as I turned toward the door. "Have you heard from Richard this morning?"

"I am happy to report that he is in his right mind and on the high road to recovery."

"Then why am I not permitted to see him?" I pointed silently to the manuscript and left the room. I returned in five hours instead of two.

A bright coal fire was burning in the grate, although the weather was warm, and Mrs. Melville sat in front of it with the manuscript in her hand. Her head was bowed upon her hand, and her whole attitude expressed the utmost dejection. There were traces of tears upon her face when she raised it to me, but the fine strong lines evincing a resolute and undaunted spirit were still there.

"How many persons besides ourselves know the contents of this manuscript?" she asked.

"Two officers and two physicians. To all others a hypothetical case was stated when I consulted them."

"Well," was the reply, "I am sorry to say that I cannot agree with your theories or your conclusions. You have kept no copy of these papers?"

"No."

In a moment the manuscript was burning on the grate.

"I don't want it in the house," she said. "Richard might get hold of it. You knew he was back here, I presume. He was brought here this afternoon, attended only by the accident and the family physician. The accident reduced him to the same condition I found him in in Virginia, so no one will be allowed to see him. We are all going abroad as soon as his health permits—Richard, Mrs. Green and myself—and may never return. Remember your agreement with me, that I was to be the sole judge as to what action should be taken on your report. If you are ever abroad, address us through the American office at Paris."

She handed me a check and bowed me out.

And that ended my connection with the Melville murder case.

I reopen the case to announce the marriage, in Paris, of Mr. Richard Melville and Mrs. Maurice Green! My informant states that they are as happy as though the honeymoon was at eighteen instead of twenty-five and thirty, and that Mrs. Clark Melville is never happier out of their sight. They are shy of the American colony, and live mostly in a pretty villa just outside the gates, where the husband is known as one of the most loving and gentle of husbands and sons! Perhaps, after all, Mrs. Clark Melville was right!

I open the case once more to introduce a note from Mrs. Clark Melville:

My DEAR MR. GATES—I mail you notice of my son's marriage to Mrs. Caroline Green. It seems they would have been married the night she left the asylum only for the accident. That was their purpose. We have almost reproduced the old New York home in France. Nellie Johnson and her husband are invaluable assistants at the villa, and no one can cook like Kate Donahue. I hear of the marriage of Miss Clara Roberts to a Boston millionaire.

Yours,
MRS. CLARK MELVILLE.

Now, can any reasonable human being suppose that she doubts the accuracy of my report?

She knows as well as I do that Richard Melville lies dead in Virginia, and that Maurice Green fills his place. How the grand old lady braves it out. I honor and respect her for it.

What won't a combination of family pride and womanly affection do?

THE NEW copyright law passed at the last session of Congress is found to be defective in that it fails to secure to American authors the immunities intended. It is not unlikely the next session will rectify the defects, and in time the great desideratum will be obtained.

AS MUCH surprise is felt by the public that the railroad companies failed to notice the passage of the New York law reducing sleeping car rates to eighty cents, as by the companies at finding it done. The railroad managers declare the statute ruinous to sleeping car interests, but we don't see how they can help themselves right away.

MASSACHUSETTS HAS won the distinction in the English House of Commons, of leading in appointing women on the board of State inspectors of buildings. The credit is, of course, unearned, but no serious protest will be made against the spreading of the misconception. We might be proud to have it true.

MINISTER RED has made a vigorous struggle for American pork in France, and success has finally crowned his efforts. He has had deep-rooted prejudice to overcome, but he was undaunted.

The Lowell Courier suggests that "he was brought up in a newspaper office," as an explanation of his puerility.

THE CONFLICTING reports about Secretary Blaine's physical condition creates much uncertainty in the minds of leading Republicans as to his chances for nomination for the Presidency in 1892. The convention is likely to be held in May, and unless his recovery from whatever malady afflicts him is speedy and certain, Mr. Harrison will be not unlikely to secure the pledges of the leading party workers.

Nobody will want to go into a Presidential fight with a physically feeble candidate, or one about whose condition there is an uncertainty, and as negotiations for so great an undertaking must necessarily be made some months in advance, the wily politician will be shy of allying himself to Mr. Blaine and thus cutting off his hopes of the favors that may fall to the bestowal of Mr. Harrison.

A STORY has been going the rounds that the Framingham Tribune had been excluded from the mails. The report sprung from the fact that an advertisement of a co-operative land company appeared in its columns. The company votes away building lots monthly and somebody took the ground that this came within the lottery law. The Tribune was notified that the department had ruled that such advertising came within the prohibition.

The statement regarding the exclusion of the paper from the mails, however, is untrue.

We have had glaring instances of continued publication of similar notices in this vicinity, and no notice has ever been taken of the matter by anybody, but it would undoubtedly be well for the public if all such publications were suppressed.

UNDER THE management of Stephen O'Meara, who has recently assumed full charge of the Boston Journal, the paper is destined to marked change and improvement. It is proposed to put in a new mammoth Hoe press, capable of printing and folding 48,000 copies of eight pages each per hour, or 24,000 ten, twelve, fourteen or sixteen page papers, or 12,000 papers containing as many as thirty-two pages.

With the new equipment the paper will be placed on an equal footing with the leading dailies in the matter of facility of supply. It is proposed to change the form of the Journal to an eight page, in conformity to the more approved style of modern journalism. The extra pages will enable the management to serve up a larger variety of news matter and in less condensed form than at present, making the Journal the most desirable daily for the office, store, or fireside, in the Commonwealth. The change will be effected about the first of September.

IT LOOKS to the discerning observer as if the Beverly and Danvers storage battery road would soon pass into the category of modern historic objects.

An attempt was made on Sunday to run a car over the line but she did not make the trip and the excuse given for failure to serve the few who desired a passage over the line was very unsatisfactory.

The road never had any inherent signs of promise. It has always required a great deal of puffing on the part of the management to keep up the interest and sustain the vacillating faith of the public in the success of the enterprise.

If permits were granted to run over the Naumkeag iron, for a considerable distance, a larger sphere of usefulness might be opened to the line; but then the question arises whether storage batteries could furnish reliable power for long trips.

It was faintly hoped at the outset by friends of the system that the road would demonstrate the practicability of secondary batteries but in this particular it seems to have failed.

THE SALEM News has published a statement during the current week to the effect that conductors of the Essex Electric railroad are in the habit of neglecting the duty of stopping their cars and going ahead to look out for the approach of trains at the North street crossing, in Salem. While it is impossible to say that such has not been the case in isolated instances, we feel warranted in saying from repeated observations that such is not by any means the rule.

The management as well as the conductors deny the statement, and interviews with passengers who are in the habit of riding on that part of the road, fail to sustain the charge made by the News.

The company's private rules require conductors to do what the News says they fail to do, and any conductor who neglected his duties in this respect would be promptly discharged if detected.

We believe the company is as solicitous for the welfare of the public as the Naumkeag or any other road, and is making efforts to serve the community as well as it can.

There seems to be a spirit of favoritism manifest in certain circles of Salem, from which even the city government is not free. This, it seems to us, is short sighted policy. Salem is the depot of supply for this part of the county and by fostering and encouraging street railroad companies running into the city, a direct benefit will be derived to her retail trade, which will redound indirectly to the general welfare of the municipality.

SERIOUS COMPLICATIONS have arisen in the mining districts of Tennessee by the employment of free and convict labor promiscuously in the mines. For about twenty years the Tennessee Coal, Iron & Railroad company has leased the convicts of the state for mining purposes, and until within a few years, employed that class of help almost exclusively; but of late years many of the leased convicts have been underlet to other mining corporations and free labor mixed with the convict miners to the number of about 2000, while the prison hands number but 500 or 600 in the companies.

A strong feeling of opposition has been manifested throughout the state for years, particularly since the employment of free miners, but the state feeling too poor to furnish adequate prison accommodations for its convicts who already greatly outnumbered the housing capacity of the state prisons, contended against the growing sentiment the best it could, until the spirit of opposition has assumed such proportions, that an outbreak has occurred by the free miners and attempt is being made to compel a discontinuance of the obnoxious system.

The free miners are said to be bards specimens of manhood, mountaineers who served during the war in the ranks of the Union or Confederacy, and their determination has reached the pitch of desperation. The state militia has been ordered to the scene of the outbreak. Governor Buchanan himself visited the locality with a determination to effectively put down the insurrection.

A compromise has been arranged and everything is settling down to business basis again.

A special session of the legislature is to be called at once, meanwhile the free miners promise to be quiet.

The practice of hiring out prisoners for mining has a strong savor of the practices or Russian punishment, especially under such conditions as prevail in Tennessee, where criminals are committed by the courts of law with no means of confinement save such as are furnished by the mining companies. We can not blame the people of that state for feeling a repugnance to the continuance of such a system.

The question of convict versus free labor has for years been a perplexing question in the United States, and there is much to be said on both sides, but it is pretty generally agreed that so far as possible at least, convicts should be employed in such a way as to prevent the usual, unfair and unwholesome competition between the honest wage earner and the convict who is employed with but a secondary motive for profit or even maintenance.

MR. EDITOR:—

The following clipping is from the British American Citizen, a paper of some influence and considerable ability, published in Boston:

The patriotic and outspoken Peabody Reporter asserts that Rome rules in that town,—that one Thomas Carroll bosses the schools,—that the teachers recently appointed have been Roman Catholics,—that a class in the high school has been punished for selecting orange as a class color,—and the Reporter printing office has been boycotted. Why not be "liberal" and "broad-minded," Brother Hoag, and let the Romanists have everything they want? Yankees have no rights which the Irish are bound to respect.

The writer has always contended that such statements as are made above should be met, not because of any effect they could have on the citizens of the town of Peabody, where the standing of the author of such statement is also well known. But neither the truth of the matter, nor the animus of such attacks as are made by the sheet from which the British American quotes are known, it is probable, to its editor or other journals which are inclined to quote from the same source. It is not true that Mr. Carroll "bosses" the schools of Peabody,—it is not true that all the teachers recently appointed have been Roman Catholics,—neither are a hundred other statements made by this sheet regarding the school committee true. And what is more, no one knows this better than the writer of such statements. Mr. Carroll may have been injudicious in some things, but not because he is an enemy of the public schools, or because he has not their welfare at heart. As chairman of the Board he does not represent himself but the committee and that committee is not a Roman Catholic body nor is it at variance with its chairman on the leading matters of which the sheet referred to by the British American Citizen complains. A large proportion of the Roman Catholic citizens of Peabody, including Mr. Carroll, are friends of the public school system. Bigotry is less excusable in an orthodox protestant than in a catholic when it comes to the introduction of religion into public school teaching.

If the British American Citizen should know the truth regarding the statements made by the sheet from which it quotes, whose bond of sympathy is its intense hatred of anything that is not "Knew-Nothingism" pure and simple, it would carefully avoid taking the public statements of that sheet in any other spirit than they are regarded by the people of the town of Peabody, who only laugh at them.

Suit has been commenced by Edwin B. Balcomb contractor and builder, against the South Congregation for refusing to award to him the contract for building the new parsonage. He was the lowest bidder. The society claim there was no argument to give the contract to the lowest bidder, but in letting plans out which was done informally, reserved the right to place it where they choose. This of course is denied by Mr. Balcomb. The job was given to Mr. Abram Lummus.

James M. Pike, father of Dr. C. C. Pike died suddenly Thursday morning at the residence of his son a half-brother of the doctors on Lowell street. Deceased was born in New London, N. Y. in October 1815. He came here from Warner N. H., about a year ago where for years he had followed the occupation of farming. The funeral took place from the residence of the doctor on Chestnut Street at four o'clock yesterday afternoon. The remains were taken to Warner for interment.

Drowned on the Hudson.

Passengers on the steamer Drew which collided with an excursion barge in the Hudson river, near Albany, last night say they believe at least two persons were drowned.

They claim that when the boats came together, three people were thrown by the shock into the water. One man was saved by the steamer's deckhands, but the other man and the woman, according to the passengers, sank beneath the waves.

The captain of the Drew admits that it was a peculiar accident, and that possibly some lives were lost.

Court of Insolvency.

On Tuesday a number of second and third meetings were held, including a third meeting in the case of George B. Ives' creditors. No action was taken by the latter however.

On Wednesday Stephen R. Kearney of Lynn, stable keeper, filed his voluntary petition in insolvency.

A. R. Milne and Emma F. Miller of Amesbury, doing business as A. R. Milne & Co., have been petitioned into insolvency.

J. V. & J. Hanson have filed a petition in insolvency against Walter B. Kezar, stable keeper, of Salem.

Identifications of more Ancient Cities of the Pharaohs.

Dr. Naville, the discoverer of Bubastis and of the Treasure City of Pithom, has just given to the world the results of his work in identifying other cities and districts in Egypt, more especially some connected with the Exodus of the Israelites: and at the end of the month of June he presented these results before one of the largest meetings ever held by the Victoria (Philosophical) Institute, of Adelphi Terrace, London, the great hall in which the meeting was held being so crowded that many had to be accommodated in the vestibule. The chair was taken on the occasion by the President, Sir Gabriel Stokes, Bart., past President of the Royal Society, and the present occupant of Sir Isaac Newton's Professional Chair at Cambridge University.

The business of the evening was commenced by Captain F. Petrie, the Honorary Secretary, reading the Report, which showed that the Institute's member's and Associates in the United States, England, India and in other parts of the world had now risen to 1,400; a number which was being added to by the almost daily applications to join. The value of the transactions was shown by the increasing number of languages into which foreign members translated them, especially those scientific papers showing the error of those who argue that Science in any way contradicted the Bible. Sir Joseph Fayrer, K. C. S. I., F. R. S., moved and Dr. Moule, who had just arrived from China, seconded the first resolution, after which Dr. Naville's address was given. He illustrated his remarks by referring to an elaborate map of his surveys. He said he had found that Succoth was not a city as some had supposed, but a district; from a remarkably valuable inscription discovered at Hithom, there was no longer any doubt that it was the Greek Heroopolis, from whence, as Strabo, Pliny, Agathemerus, and Artemidorus described, merchant ships sailed to Arabian Gulf. This fact concided with the results of modern scientific surveys, which showed that there had been a gradual rising of the land, and that the Red Sea once extended up to the walls of Pithom; this must have been the case about 3,000 years ago, and Sir William Dawson and the French engineer Linant held that it went even further north. The next place noted by M. Naville, was Baal Zephon, and in identifying this, he had been aided through some recently discovered papyri, which proved that it was not a village or city, but an ancient shrine of Baal and a noted place of pilgrimage. Other places were Migdol and Pi Habirot, and here again a papyrus had helped him, it seemed probable that the Serapeum was the Egyptian Maktal or Migdol, and it was greatly to be regretted that a bilingual tablet discovered there a few years ago had been destroyed before being deciphered. The bearing of his identifications was of no small interest to the students of History, both sacred and other. Sir John Coode, K. C. S. I., who had surveyed the canal for the British Government, moved a vote of thanks to M. Naville, and the other authors of papers read during the year, namely, Sir W. Dawson, F. R. S., Professor Hull, F. R. S., Lord Grimthorpe, Mr. T. Pinches and Mr. Boscawen, the Assyriologists, Surgeon-General Gordon, C. B., of Indian fame, and others. A vote of thanks to the President concluded the proceedings. A Conversation was then held in the Museum.

Teaching a Girl to Swim.

In deep water under the care of an experienced person, a young girl may be taught to swim in a much shorter time than by practicing in shallow streams, says a good authority in the August Ladies Home Journal. A rope can be fastened around her breast in such a manner that it will neither tighten nor unloose, and if courageous enough, she can, thus prepared, plunge in head first. The teacher will show her the proper way to use the arms, and, finding herself protected by the rope, she will feel more faith in the exertion made. The aid of the hand is, however, far better than this, as it can be relinquished insensibly. The best method of teaching on this plan is for a good swimmer to carry the learner in his arms into the water until breast high, laying her nearly flat upon it, and supporting her by placing one hand under the chest, at the same time giving instructions as to the proper motion of hands, arms and feet. In a few days the hand may be gradually withdrawn, and the girl-swimmer able to do without it. There are ever so many "don'ts" about swimming. Unlike Punch's, they begin after the act is signed, sealed and delivered, and you are a fair swimmer. The most important piece of negative advice is, Don't ever lose your presence of mind. With that you are mistress of the situation, and other things not overwhelmingly against you, can reach land again.

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS.

William T. Lee, druggist, believes that the secret of success is perseverance. Therefore he persists in keeping the finest line of perfumeries, toilet articles, cosmetics, drugs and chemicals on the market. He especially invites all persons who have palpitation, short breath, weak or hungry spells, pain in side or shoulder, oppression, night mare, dry cough, smothering, dropsy or heart disease to try Dr. Miles' unequalled New Heart Cure, before it is too late. It has the largest sale of any similar remedy. Fine book of testimonials free. Dr. Miles' Restorative Nerve is unsurpassed for sleeplessness, headache, fits, etc., and it contains no opiate.

Why Co-Operation Succeeded in England.

Distributive co-operation has been, perhaps, brought before the public most prominently through the success of the so-called co-operative stores in England, but such stores, strange to say, in this country have not been a success, although other forms of co-operation here have succeeded admirably. The reason, however, is probably found in the different conditions. In England the retail trade had grown into a system of long credits. Many landed proprietors and others received their income only at long intervals, and this led retail merchants into the habit of selling a large portion of their trade on long time, which inevitably resulted in considerable losses from bad debts; so the dealers had to raise their margins of profit upon all their customers to a point which would still leave them a living. This was virtually making the cash-paying support the customer who did not pay at all; and when this abuse became extended, the persons with fixed incomes who paid their debts naturally objected, and the result was the formation of societies for co-operative distribution on an economical cash basis.—North American Review.

Hampton Falls having promised to remit taxes for ten years, Arthur M. Dodge of Clark & Dodge, the Tilton hosiery manufacturers, has agreed to erect a hosiery mill at the Falls.

The late John Boyle O'Reilly is given generous treatment by the London Daily News in a recent editorial on his career. In the first place, the News calls him the "most brilliant Irish-American of our time"; and the conclusion is that O'Reilly, the mature man, came to understand England as liberal England has come to understand Ireland. "He died our friend," says the News, "and all Englishmen who knew him, and they were many, and thousands who did not know him regretted his premature death."

Work Among the Tanners.

The tanneries and currying shops of Woburn, Winchester, Salem and Peabody have curtailed their output some 65000 sides a week. The crop tanneries of Pennsylvania have curtailed as much, while many of the upper leather tanneries throughout the country have largely curtailed, and it is not unreasonable to believe the present demand is not within 100,000 of hides a week as compared with a year ago. This is by no means a discouraging sign of the times for the leather men. It shows that the trade is working itself into a healthy promising future. If the shoe business should suddenly assume increased activity this fall, creating a demand for leather, the surplus stock now in store would grow less, and an activity in tanneries and among hide men would at once show itself. In case of a sharp demand prices would likely strengthen all around.—Shoe and Leather Review.

The Storm.

The thick black clouds scud swift across the sky, And peaceful ocean lashes into foam, The wild sea-gull sends forth its piercing cry, And sea-mews send their plaintive moan—Portentous that a storm is nigh.

The billows leap as with an impulse bold, And spend their force upon the rock-bound shore, Just as a Knight with passions uncontrolled, Forgets for the hand he did adore—Precious, beyond the price of gold,

The storm comes on, and through the darkened cloud The lightning flares, and following the flash, Comes deep and long, the thunders rolling loud, Which ending with a mighty crash, Seems if the earth to Zeus has bowed.

The fierce winds ease their howling and their might, The lightnings cease, the thunders steal away, And through the rift of cloud appears in sight The sunbeams on the earth to play, To give it cheer and make it bright.

FRED GOLDSMITH WALKER.

Oregon Fish and Fishermen.

The happiest man on earth is the man who likes to fish and has the opportunity. Therefore the Oregon angler ought to be happy. There are, of course, many sources of pleasure in this world for those disposed to enter into the spirit of the various entertainments, but from the days when the disciples fished in the sea of Galilee to the present time the angler has been regarded as the best example of human contentment and happiness; so much so in fact, that in modern times angling is spoken of as the gentle art. Nevertheless, fishermen are looked upon, the world over, as great liars. I don't know why. Anglers as a rule are gentlemen; and gentlemen will not lie. Ignorant, worldly people imagine, because the angler comes home with a basket of fingerlings and a story about hooking and losing a monster that carried away his fly, leader and may be part of his tip, that he is lying about the monster. They don't stop to consider that the big fish are more powerful, active and cunning, and therefore better able to get away than the little ones.

Sometimes it happens that the angler is able to prove what he says, although we must confess that this is the exception to a general rule. I once caught a fine 8-pounder just below a high dam. In landing him he got soiled, and I stepped above the dam to rinse him. He looked so symmetrical and handsome after being washed that I held him up for the delectation of my envious companions across the stream. How he did it I don't know, but like a flash of light he sprang out of my hands and into water 14 ft. deep. My first impulse was to go after him and I went. I got my fish all right enough, but if my statement was not backed up by substantial proof I would not make it, for the general verdict would be, as usual, that it was another fish lie. When you consider the facts, however, there is nothing remarkable about it. You see, the fish coming from rapid to still water in a dazed condition naturally lost his bearings and luckily, when so ardently pursued, shot directly up to and upon the sloping dam and became easy prey for the merman that was after him.—Forest and Stream.

A HUSBAND'S MISTAKE.

Husbands too often permit their wives, parents and children to suffer from headache, dizziness, neuralgia, sleeplessness, fits, nervousness, when by the use of Dr. Miles' Restorative Nerve such serious results could be easily prevented. Druggists everywhere say it gives universal satisfaction, and has an immense sale. Woodworth & Co., of Fort Wayne, Ind.; Snow & Co., of Syracuse, N. Y.; J. C. Wolf, Hillsdale, Mich.; and hundreds of others say "it is the greatest seller they ever knew." It contains no opiates. Trial bottles and fine book on Nervous Diseases, free at Wm. T. Lee's.

Baron Hirsch's Plans for the Jews.

What I desire to accomplish, what, after many failures, has come to be the object of my life, and that for which I am ready to stake my wealth and my intellectual powers, is to give to a portion of my companions in faith the possibility of finding a new existence, primarily as farmers and also as handicraftsmen, in those lands where the laws and religious tolerance permit them to carry on the struggle for existence as noble and responsible subjects of a human government. . . . Guided by those convictions, my course for philanthropic work was clearly shown me. By establishing organizations in Orient and in Galicia I wished to give the Jews who had remained in the faith the opportunity of becoming good farmers and craftsmen without removing them from the land upon which they were settled, and agricultural schools and schools for manual training were to supply the means for teaching them. It is necessary, however, to adopt some other method for aiding those Jews who are driven from their country, and are obliged to seek new homes across the ocean. And it is at present, therefore, my greatest desire to accomplish a work on a much more important scale, and of quite a different character from any adopted up to the present time—a purpose which, it may be reasonably hoped, will bring about the results already mentioned. The question is, then to help the Russian Jews who have just been exiled from their homes to find new countries where they can use their powers freely, where they can bring into practice again the qualities they inherited from their ancestors, and finally, where they can become useful citizens of a free and secure country in which the rights of all inhabitants are equal. In considering this plan, I naturally thought of the United States, where the liberal constitution is a guarantee of happy development for the followers of all religions faiths. Yet I was obliged to confess that to increase to any great extent the already enormous number of Jews in the United States would be of advantage neither to the country itself nor to the exiled Jews; for it is my firm conviction that this new settlement should be scattered through different lands and spread over a large space, so that there shall be no opportunity for social or religious rupture. I made a study, therefore, of different countries, and after careful examination I have become convinced that the Argentine Republic, Canada, and Australia, above all others, offer the surest guarantee for the accomplishment of the plan. I expect to begin with the Argentine Republic, and arrangements for the purchase of certain lands for the settlement are now being made.—North American Review.

[For The Press.]

The Storm.

The thick black clouds scud swift across the sky, And peaceful ocean lashes into foam, The wild sea-gull sends forth its piercing cry, And sea-mews send their plaintive moan—Portentous that a storm is nigh.

The billows leap as with an impulse bold, And spend their force upon the rock-bound shore, Just as a Knight with passions uncontrolled, Forgets for the hand he did adore—Precious, beyond the price of gold,

The storm comes on, and through the darkened cloud The lightning flares, and following the flash, Comes deep and long, the thunders rolling loud, Which ending with a mighty crash, Seems if the earth to Zeus has bowed.

The fierce winds ease their howling and their might, The lightnings cease, the thunders steal away, And through the rift of cloud appears in sight The sunbeams on the earth to play, To give it cheer and make it bright.

FRED GOLDSMITH WALKER.

Oregon Fish and Fishermen.

The happiest man on earth is the man who likes to fish and has the opportunity. Therefore the Oregon angler ought to be happy. There are, of course, many sources of pleasure in this world for those disposed to enter into the spirit of the various entertainments, but from the days when the disciples fished in the sea of Galilee to the present time the angler has been regarded as the best example of human contentment and happiness; so much so in fact, that in modern times angling is spoken of as the gentle art. Nevertheless, fishermen are looked upon, the world over, as great liars. I don't know why. Anglers as a rule are gentlemen; and gentlemen will not lie. Ignorant, worldly people imagine, because the angler comes home with a basket of fingerlings and a story about hooking and losing a monster that carried away his fly, leader and may be part of his tip, that he is lying about the monster. They don't stop to consider that the big fish are more powerful, active and cunning, and therefore better able to get away than the little ones.

Sometimes it happens that the angler is able to prove what he says, although we must confess that this is the exception to a general rule. I once caught a fine 8-pounder just below a high dam. In landing him he got soiled, and I stepped above the dam to rinse him. He looked so symmetrical and handsome after being washed that I held him up for the delectation of my envious companions across the stream. How he did it I don't know, but like a flash of light he sprang out of my hands and into water 14 ft. deep. My first impulse was to go after him and I went. I got my fish all right enough, but if my statement was not backed up by substantial proof I would not make it, for the general verdict would be, as usual, that it was another fish lie. When you consider the facts, however, there is nothing remarkable about it. You see, the fish coming from rapid to still water in a dazed condition naturally lost his bearings and luckily, when so ardently pursued, shot directly up to and upon the sloping dam and became easy prey for the merman that was after him.—Forest and Stream.

An Old Story.

Old Captain Prout, for whom Prout's Neck, now a well-known summer resort, is named, was noted gunner in the days when waterfowl were plenty in that vicinity. "Early one spring, 1860 or thereabouts," said an old settler to me, "he brought home from the West Indies a gun, the like of which had never been seen by the natives. It was a muzzleloader, about a 2-gauge, and weighed some 30 lbs. Soon after its arrival there came a heavy storm, and the next morning a pond a couple of acres in extent back of the Captain's barn was covered with ducks so thick that another one could not have possibly been squeezed in. Here was an opportunity to try the new gun, and loading it with the regulation charge, of 1-4lb. powder and 1-2lb. shot, he sallied forth. At the corner of the barn he cocked the piece and stepped out with it held in readiness. When within about 40yds. all the ducks jumped as one bird. The Captain aimed at the middle of the mass and fired."

Here my informant stopped as if expecting some encouragement, and somewhat against my will I felt constrained to ask, "How many did he get?"

"Wal" he replied, "he didn't get any, he undershot, but he picked up three bushels of ducks' legs." — Forest and Stream.

In Case of a Dog's Bite.

If you are unfortunate enough to be bitten by a dog, waste no time in sending for a physician. But the wound requires instant attention, writes Dr. Paul Gibber in the August Ladies' Home Journal. First, wash it immediately with clean, tepid water. If this is not readily obtainable, clean water of any temperature will answer. This will do until a physician arrives. If you should be so situated that a physician cannot attend upon you, then act:

After flushing out the wound with clean water, apply, by means of a glass dropper, a powerful antiseptic. I regard peroxide of hydrogen (medicinal) as the best compound.

Don't cauterize. In my opinion it is a needlessly painful operation, and is very seldom accomplished soon enough to prevent the hydrophobic infection from taking place.

Having applied the antiseptic (peroxide of hydrogen) to the sore, take care not to remove the white foam that will be generated. Let it remain until it disappears, which will occur in a few minutes. This being done, a compress of absorbent cotton, soaked in the peroxide of hydrogen, should be laid over the sore, with an over-covering of oiled silk.

Twice every day the wound should be dressed in the same manner, with the exception that the peroxide of hydrogen, instead of being used full strength, should be diluted, half and half, with clean water being preferable.

The subsequent treatment depends upon the condition of the dog that inflicted the wound. Don't kill the animal unless it shows evident symptoms of hydrophobia. Have it placed securely in a safe place. If, at the expiration of one week, or not more than two weeks, it has not shown any abnormal symptoms, the patient need not fear.

If, on the contrary the dog sickens and dies, the patient should be treated by the Pasteur method as quickly as possible. The sooner the better. At the same time the contents of the dog's stomach and a portion of its spinal marrow, in glycerine, should be sent to the Pasteur Institute, No. 178 West Tenth street, New York city, where experiments may decide whether the animal died with hydrophobia or not.

Should the animal have been shot or otherwise killed, it is advisable that the patient should submit at once to the Pasteur treatment, for two reasons: first, because it is harmless; second, because its efficacy has been proved beyond a doubt, over fifteen thousand persons having inoculated since Pasteur's discovery.

In case the animal remains in good health, it is unnecessary that the patient submit to inoculation.

Progressive men.

Men who will push their own business.

Men who believe in their own town, and who can see its good points.

Men who will patronize home enterprises and buy goods of home manufacture.

Men who will not tell a stranger that he is a fool to come here.

Men who are bound to keep in the swim and whose love of progress extends to their pocket-books.

Men who will invest in home property and home enterprises.

Men who rejoice to see the town more rich and happy.

Well balanced men, men with the zeal and enthusiasm of Southern or Western boomers.

Public benefactors who will aid churches, libraries and hospitals.

Men who will do something besides croak. — Exchange.

USEFUL HINTS.

A very good authority gives a simple remedy for hiccup:—a lump of sugar saturated with vinegar. Of ten cuses, tried as an experiment, hiccup was stopped in nine.

Most people wipe their faces downward; that is, from forehead to chin. This is a mistake. Always use upward—from the chin to the forehead—and outward—toward the ear—motions. Never wipe any part of the face downward.

The sleeping-room may be cooled for a time by wringing large pieces of cotton out of water and hanging them before the open windows. Leave the door open, and as the air comes through the wet cotton it will be cooled.

Asthma may be greatly relieved by soaking blotting or tissue paper in strong saltpeter water; dry it, then burn it at night in the sleeping-room.

For a cut, take powdered resin, pound it very fine and spread or sift it over the cut; wrap a piece of linen around it, and wet it in cold water quite often. This will prevent inflammation and soreness.

Keep the gas turned low during the process of undressing, and sleep without a light, unless it is a tiny night-lamp.

A gown that is to be worn in climbing and tramping about the mountains, has a bell-shaped skirt of blue serge. Over this is worn a bright red-and-white-striped waistcoat closed with small pearl bullet buttons. Then, the jacket is of serge like the gown, lined throughout with red satin, and having its collar and cuffs of dark-blue velvet. The hat is a soft felt one of dark blue, something like the beef-eater shape, and has a high bow of scarlet standing up just in front. The parasol is also of scarlet. The woman who wears this looks marvelously well just where she is, among the mountains. But it must be remembered that such a costume would be extremely out of place anywhere else. — Ladies' Home Journal.

One of the most useful hints for sick-room attendance, one very seldom known outside of a hospital ward, is how to obtain a cold cloth without the use of ice. In fevers, or weakness, a cold cloth on the forehead, face, or base of the brain, is one of the most comforting things in the world. All that is necessary is to wet a linen cloth, wave it to and fro in the air, fold it, and place on the patient. Have another cloth ready, waving it to and fro, just before applying it; these cloths have a more grateful and lasting coldness than that produced by ice.

If troubled with headache, try the simultaneous application of hot water to the feet and back of the neck.

A tea made by pouring boiling water over sweet flagroot will relieve worm sickness in children and is also good for colic.

Forms of Oaths.

The oath was originally an appeal to divine authority to ratify an assertion. The old Greek gods swore by the Styx, and Jehovah is represented in the early books of the bible as swearing by himself, there being none higher, says the St. Louis Republic. The forms of an oath among the Hebrews was: "By the God of Abraham." "God do so unto me," and "God knoweth." In Assam and in India, two persons desiring to take an oath, or affirm with great solemnity, take a foul or a dog, one by its head, the other by its tail. The Oaths of Siberia swear by the head of a bear, making a motion with the jaws and expressing the hope that they may be devoured if they speak falsely.

In ancient times it was considered essential to the validity of an oath that witness should hold something in his hand or place it upon some object of great sanctity. With the Jews it was the book of the law, which, no doubt, led to the use of the Bible in Christian courts of justice. The Bedouin Arabs have, from the most remote period, used various forms of adjuration. One of these was By the Temple; another, still in use, is as follows: The person taking the oath takes hold of the middle pole of the tent and swears by the life of the tent and its owners. Mahomet swore by the setting of the stars, a most poetical oath, though hardly so magnificent as to oft quoted adjuration of William the conqueror, who swore by the splendor of God. The Roman oath of olden times was made with great solemnity and elaboration. In Roman mythology, Juno making a promise to sleep, strengthened it by taking the heavens in one hand and the earth in the other. Greeks and Romans swore by their gods, by the Styx, by Olympus, by their sacred springs, wells and rivers, and by the moon. There oaths were of much value and meaning during the early days of the republic, but worthless after they became corrupt.

Oaths lost their sanctity, and became colloquial or profane at a very early time among the Jews. Greek ladies swore faintly by Venus, Diana and Juno, and then by some male god whose name was frequently taken in vain by their liege lords. The French monarchs, too, had their own peculiar forms of oaths.

Louis IX, so devout in his old age, swore by God's resurrection. Charles VIII, swore by the light of God. Louis XII, who well merited the title Father of his People, desiring to emphasize an assertion, simply said: May the devil carry me off. Charles IX satisfied his morbid desire for some form of profanity by saying, by the head of God, or by God's death. Henry IV. also had two oaths which he freely punctuated his conversation. One was: Jarnpieu, (may I deny God), and the other was: By the belly of Gris, St. Gris was the god of drunkards.

A SEASIDE GOWN.

Distinguished by Very Graceful Skirt Drapery and Fancy Corset.

Our cut gives both back and front views of an attractive dress for the seashore. The skirt of gray lady's cloth just touches the ground, and at the side on the right hip is artistically draped one of the ends of the bodice front.

The sides of the bodice are in the cloth, filled in at the back with a tapering plastron of figured material. The fancy corset which, with the sleeves, is of the plain gray, is surrounded with a vandyke of steel cord. On the cuffs is an applique of white cloth to correspond with the all-over pattern which covers the high bodice, and the side kiltings also in gray cloth.

Novelties in Neck Wear.

The following new arrangements for completing the summer toilet are described by Harper's Bazar. A white net ruche for the neck is newer than those of black lace. It is made of large meshed net, such as fish net, edged with the narrowest purling. The fullness is laid in box plaits in the middle of inch wide ribbon; the frills are each three inches wide above and below the ribbon, the upper frill drooping over and caught now and then to that below. The ribbon extends in long ends in front to tie in a bow.

A collar of long stemmed Parma violets is another novelty for wearing with afternoon costumes. There is first a deep fall of black lace passing around the neck, and in a jabot to the waist in front; the violets are mounted on the lace to flare outward about the neck, and are thickly clustered down the jabot.

A fold of thin French crape, wrought with jet or two folds of Brussels net dotted with fine beads, gives the black finish to the neck and sleeves of dark gowns. A trimming of lace like that used elsewhere on the gown is preferred by many, as frills falling on the hand and an erect frill at the neck. Chiffon mousseline folds also edge dress collars, while other collars are formed entirely of folds of chiffon. The soft, drooping frills of chiffon are so becoming that they remain in favor notwithstanding the fancy for tea tinted and coffee colored laces beaded with jet.

Parisians are wearing plaitings and collars of the sheerest linen cambric, with embroidery drawn work or lace as trimming. Linen collars, which have been so long out of favor, are again worn here with tailor gowns. The collar is the English band of linen with points broken over at the throat, or else a wider collar that flares slightly and is turned down narrowly all along the edge. A chemisette neatly tucked or in a wide box plait like a shirt front is added to such collars, and a four-in-hand scarf of foulard or of crepe de chine is worn. Linen cuffs are wide and are made to meet and fasten with linked buttons of gold or chased silver.

Arranging Lace Flounces.

A pretty and uncommon way of arranging lace flounces, now being affected by some of the leading dressmakers, is to use one flounce, if it is about four yards long, by festooning it twice across the front of the skirt, first half way down and secondly near the edge of the skirt, turning over the top of the lace in a two or three inch hem, running a ribbon in it, and gathering it up on the basque at the back of the bodice or slightly to one side. Each flounce, or rather the half of the one flounce, for it is not cut, but turned back) has its separate drawstring, so that four ends are caught up together at the back. The lace is draped in one festoon. It is possible to arrange three festoons across the front, and is sometimes done. If there are short lengths, or an old fashioned berthe, it is carried around the top of the low bodice, and forms short, full sleeves.

A Little Girl's Dress.

The child's frock depicted in the cut is simplicity itself, but it is picturesque simplicity. The blouse front, back and elbow sleeves of this dress are in chambray colored nun's veiling. The blouse front, is gathered into a pointed yoke. The vest fronts and side panel are in figured pongee silk, as is the yoke and standing collar. Cockscorn lace frillings down the sleeves add a light touch to the very pretty frock.

The "Tiddledy Winks" Apron.

It is a great desideratum to find a pinafore for little girls that shall protect the front of the dress and at the same time be a pretty garment in itself. An admirable apron for this purpose has just been brought out under the name of the "Tiddledy Winks." It is made in many kinds of fabric—batiste, flowered zephyr, lawn and fancy net. The apron covers the greater part of the frock; it is cut with a yoke, and is drawn in at the waist with a smart silk cord.

Black grenadine gowns rival those of lace, so long in favor.

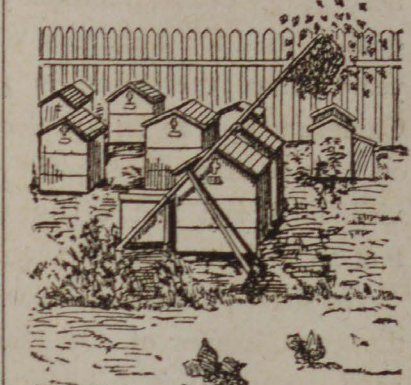

WHEN THE BEES SWARM.

Two Simple Catchers That Have Been Successfully Used by Noted Apiarists.

In gleanings in Bee Culture attention is called to the fact that a wire corn popper makes one of the best swarm catchers ever devised. Mr. Root writes as follows concerning it:

One morning the bees in the home apiary got the swarming mania in earnest. Two had already come out and been hived and three more were in the air. Fortunately they clustered separately. Two of them were hived by the old way. The third was secured by means of a large corn popper, such as cost twenty-five cents at the stores. The lid of the popper was thrown back and the popper itself was crowded up gently against the lower end of the cluster. The bees soon rolled over and over each other until the popper was level full of them. The wirecloth top was thrown over and snapped shut. We did not know whether we had secured the queen or not. It did not matter much, for half or two-thirds of the cluster was confined in the popper, and the queen, if outside, together with the remaining bees, would cluster around their captive comrades. We thrust the handle down into the soft dirt near where the bees were flying quite thick, and the popper was thus supported a couple of feet from the ground, where the bees could get at them. We then left them for an hour or so. When we returned all the outside bees were clustered around the popper. They were now in such shape that we could carry them where we pleased, and have them where we pleased, which we did with entire success.

A SIMPLE SWARMING APPARATUS.

In the cut is shown a swarm catcher used by A. E. Manum, one of Vermont's successful beekeepers. It is simply a wire cloth cage fastened to a pole with two legs, so attached to the pole that they can be set out or in, something like a tripod. The lower end of the pole may be sharpened to stick in the ground, in order to steady the catcher and to prevent it from being tipped forward by the weight of the bees. Mr. Root suggests that the corn popper is cheaper than a cage made to order and just as effective. The cut is given to show the mode of placing the catcher.

In it are also illustrated a few of the Chapman honey plants.

Just here occur two ideas worth bringing up. The first is that if the queens are not clipped the queen herself will usually be found on the outside of the cluster, or near the bottom end, for, it is said, bees will never hang to the queen. If, therefore, the corn popper cage or other receptacle be pushed gently against the lower end of the swarm you are likely to secure not only the larger portion of the bees, but the queen also; and in this event your swarming is practically done. The other idea is this: After these wirecloth cages have been used a few times for catching swarms they will acquire the scent of the laying queen and of former swarms. The catcher will in consequence be more readily accepted for clustering by succeeding swarms. In time these cages will have little bits of wax adhering to them, and these also form no small part of the attraction.

Three Profitable Breeds of Poultry.

Mr. W. J. Salter, the former superintendent of the large Dunbar poultry farm and now manager of the Hill poultry yards, tells that the white Wyandottes always ranked highest as layers at both places. The Fancier's Journal says its own experience has been very favorable with white Wyandottes as layers, but the silver laced have surpassed them in numbers and size of eggs laid. However, it is glory enough for America to have produced two such magnificent breeders as the Plymouth Rock and Wyandottes. Both are bread winners. The value of these two breeds does not consist alone in the number of eggs they lay during the winter, but in the fact that the dressed carcasses are exceedingly fine and heavy. The cost to produce six or seven pound roosters is no more than the cost to produce three or four pound chickens of the Spanish breeds. The light Brahma judiciously handled is another very profitable fowl. Mr. Rankin considers it the most profitable of all for market poultry.

Try It.

We want a large number of our readers to try the experiment of sowing winter rye in their cornfields just after the last going through with the cultivator and report next spring what they think of it. It is no experiment with a number of leading dairymen that we know. They claim that it pays a big profit on the investment, as it gives fresh pasture the latest in the fall and the earliest in the spring. One party informed us the other day that during the high price of butter in April he got enough out of his early rye to more than twice pay the expense of sowing it. Try it, advises Hoard's Dairyman.

SALEM, July 25, 1891.

The native Turkish rug-weaver in our window is showing how the richly, beautiful fabrics of the Orient are made.

Value comes with age. Generation after generation of indolently treading bare feet bring to true perfection the glossy silken lustre which constitutes the beauty and value of Turkish rugs.

We have brought to Salem for your inspection a collection of these artistic trophies as has not been seen here in years.

Kiva, Daghestan, Yorook, Persian, Bahndur, Cashmere, Bokhara, Kazak, Carabagh, Bloochestim, Shirnahan, Kirman, Anatolia, etc.

In ordinary sizes, $8 to $30.

In carpet sizes, $55 to $125.

One rare specimen deserves especial notice: A silken Chinese rug of extraordinary quality, used for hundreds of years before the shrine in a Chinese temple to be kneeled on. Knee-marks are plainly visible. It is 3 feet 9, by 5 feet 10, and the price is $600.

We shall be glad to have the connoisseurs of Oriental rugs come to this exhibition—from people experienced in them we are sure of quick appreciation.

It is from that eminent free trade paper, the New York Evening Post, that we learn that the defeat of Sir Henry Parkes in New South Wales is attracting much attention in England, where he is chiefly known as an ardent free trader. His successful opponent is a protectionist and a Republican, and it is seriously asked whether the victory is due chiefly to Republicanism or protectionism.

Why They Trade at Home.

Our readers will find on the fifth page an announcement from the enterprising firm of Wm. G. Webber & Co., that may be read with genuine profit. For months the aisles of this great emporium have been filled on bargain days and many other days, with ladies from all parts of the County, who go there in preference to Boston and other large cities. Here they feel familiar with both clerks and proprietors, and they have confidence that if goods prove unsatisfactory or different in any way from what they had thought, they may exchange them without being subjected to those annoyances that arise in dealing with strangers. Above all the proprietors of the establishment are so well known, that implicit confidence is felt in the representations made by their clerks. Goods are never misrepresented.

A Novel Sight.

A deal of curiosity is aroused in the minds of young and old, to see the "real live" Turkish rug weaver at work in the large show window of Almy, Bigelow & Washburn, on Essex street, Salem. It is said the piece he is now at work on will keep him busy for about three weeks. The loom on which he weaves is of the most primitive design, bearing little resemblance to the costly machinery used for weaving general fabrics in this country. Each separate piece of colored wool is tied by hand to the warp, making the process very laborious and at American rates of wages, it would be exceedingly expensive.

It is said the richness of the famous Turkish rugs is derived from long wear under the tread of many bare feet. Often generations tread the woolly surface before the enormous value is imparted to the fabrics.

A Haverhill Sensation.

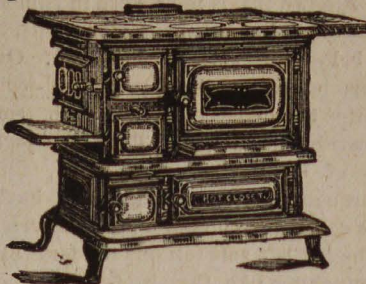

A decided sensation was created in Haverhill on Wednesday by the announcement that Charles Russell, a wealthy farmer, residing on the Lawrence road, about three miles from the city, had married his housekeeper. He is 90 years old and ill; the bride is about half that age.

The couple drove to Lawrence, where, after calling on several ministers, all of whom refused to perform the ceremony, they finally succeeded in getting married.

Complete House Furnishing Emporium.

What is an Emporium? What goes into its make up? Why the term? The term at once suggests something large. A business conducted on an extensive scale. A mart of trade where everything of a special branch or several branches of a particular line are gathered together under one head. Such a combination properly managed affords at once immense advantages over single department stores. Advantages in the way of trading with one salesman. Buying your goods at one place. Quicker service. Contracting a single bill in place of three or four. And lower prices ALWAYS from the fact that the items of expense in running such a store are made smaller in a dozen ways. Such is our Emporium, and its popularity is best attested by our constantly increasing trade. Remember that we have four floors fully stocked with GOODS THAT SELL.

Attention! Everybody!!

Do you love a cool and refreshing drink of Soda or Moxie? If you do, call for one of Stevens' Best. We can furnish you six days in the week, but on the seventh you will have to go dry. We have at our store all of the stations of both electric and horse cars running in and out of Peabody; but on the seventh day, or Sunday, you will be obliged to stand out of door in the heat or the rain as the case might be, as we have had a notice served on us by the so-called Law and Order League of Peabody, denying us the right to sell Soda, Confectionery, Cigars or Tobacco on that day. Therefore, we were obliged to close as we could not furnish, could not keep open.

She needs it! 10,000 inhabitants and not a hotel or public house in the place! No inducements for strangers to visit us! No wonder our business is dull! No wonder our factories lay idle, our tanneries shut up and all business at a standstill! What we want is liberal sentiment and not littleness of mind! Then we shall grow and prosper as other Towns round about us.

Don't think we are losing courage at this state of affairs. We hope to see them righted and to live to see the good old Town once more redeemed and made prosperous as in the days gone by.

We have a large and fine stock of goods in our store, and we shall try to sell you as cheap as elsewhere. All fruits in their season. Choice Cigars, Confectionery, Tobacco and a thousand things too numerous to mention.

Will try to give you a lunch as well as we know how. Polite clerks always in attendance.

La France's Latest.

Says the Elmira, (N. Y.) Daily Gazette and Free Press: "The wonderful inventive genius of Tuxton S.
La France, who invented and established the now successful and progressive La France Steam Fire Engine Works in this city, which enjoys a world wide reputation, has again achieved a triumph unparalleled in mechanics, and has produced an invention which promises to revolutionize the fire apparatus of the world. Mr.
La France's last invention is a simple, durable and powerful pump which will throw immense quantities of water with great force. The device is the result of years of study. Application has been filed for patents of the United States. The pump is of the piston pattern and is in constant use at the works of the inventor, where it is being thoroughly tested. Its chief claims to superiority are great force and extreme compactness. In the old style pump, if a valve should give out or anything become disarranged in the pumping apparatus of a fire engine, it would be necessary to stop the engine and remove it from its post of duty and hours might be required to prepare the machine for action again. Mr. La France's pump is so constructed that by removing a few bolts the pump can be overhauled in very short time.
The pumping capacity seems to be unlimited. In a recent experiment the trial pump was run up to a water pressure of 195 pounds without appearing to approach its limit of capacity. This was done with a steam pressure of 150 pounds on a fourth class engine.

Those interested in fire departments and apparatus will watch with interest the future development of this colossus of pumping mechanism.

One of the steamers of this town is from the works of Mr. La France, which fact gives additional interest to the success of the new invention to our department.

for a tally-ho ride to Rowley, in Macdonald's coach.

William A. Farham, formerly of this town and a resident of Gloucester for the past few years, has removed back to Peabody, and will enter the employ of the Essex railroad.

An attempt was made Friday afternoon to burglarize the residence of Harvey Wilson on Andover street.
Nothing of value was taken the parties being frightened away.

Arthur Simmoneau of Lowell who was injured at West Peabody by being jammed between two freight cars died at Salem hospital on Thursday. He leaves a wife and four children.

The Essex company has received a new 80-horse power dynamo for its power station from the T-H works.
Power for the cars will soon be supplied from its own plant on Derby wharf.

The vestibule car which is to take Union Post 50, G. A. R., party to Detroit tomorrow morning, stands on a siding near the depot. About 30 pilgrims will occupy the vehicle when she starts.

Rev. George A. Hall and all of his family are quite sick at their summer cottage in Beverly. The condition of the children has been quite critical.
They will all return to town as soon as they are able to stand the journey.

Harry G. Robbins who has been head clerk at the Central Fish Market, severs his connection tonight, to open a car station and fruit store in the building formerly used as a barber shop, next to the Central Fish Market.

The annual picnic of N. W. Edson & Co.'s clerks was held at the Willows Thursday. The time for the annual picnic of the grocery and provision clerks in town, at Nahant, has passed and probably none will be held this year.

All persons going on the trip to Detroit must secure tickets by this evening. The train starts at 7.30 Sunday morning and the members of Post 50 who are booked for the excusion will assemble at headquarters at 7 o'clock sharp.

Two Ball nines composed of members of the St. John's C. T. A. S.

"A Chance to Make Money."

The Bryant & Stratton Commercial School of Boston, which our readers will notice advertised in this week's issue, will re-open Tuesday, Sept. 1.
This school needs no recommendation from us, as its present standing and reputation, gained during the last 23 years, places it at the head of all schools of a similar character. It can be patronized with full confidence that nothing that is possible to be done for the pupils will be left undone.

The Veteran Firemen's association held a meeting at the Central station, Wednesday evening, and voted to accept the invitation of the Marblehead association to attend the opening of their fair on August 7. It was also voted to attend the muster to be held in Lowell, September 23, on the conditions laid down by the Lowell association, which were that the Lowell engine be allowed to enter for the prizes and the Lowell association furnish all the money for the expense of the tournament.

Sidney C. Bancroft Esq., who for several years has been a distinguished member of the Essex bar, and a resident of this town passed away suddenly at Baker's Island on Tuesday afternoon as he was preparing to return from a week's outing at the Winnegan hotel on the island.
He has been ill for the past seven months, during which time he has not visited his office. His disease was consumption. He was born in town in April, 1826 and began life as a mason.
He was employed on the Ipswich House of Correction and several other well known buildings. A love of literature rather than a distaste for mechanics prompted him to leave his trade and adopt a profession. He studied law with Otis P. Lord who was afterward justice of the Superior and Supreme courts. Shortly before he was raised to the bench. Mr.
Lord desired to enter into business relations with Mr. Bancroft, but the offers were refused and he commenced practice on his own account. He has at various times been located in Salem, Boston and Peabody. He has had an extensive, varied and at times lucrative practice, has and been engaged in a number of very important and noted cases.

A Plea for the Public Schools.

The private school may be more fashionable than the public school; it is certainly superior in nothing else.
The typical pupil of the private boarding-school is the philistine child. He has plenty of money and spends it freely on what only harms his better nature; he is shallow and sordid, but he makes great pretences, and is supremely satisfied with his littleness.
The typical pupil of the public school is the boy who is not rich and is not cultivated. His code of honor or of manners is not burdened by conventionalities; he values your son for his manliness and pluck, not at all for the shape of his collar or the size of his cravat. He is uncouth; but when once real refinement is brought to him, he admits its charm and is anxious to win some of its richness. Is it not better for your own son, if you be a rich man, that he avoid this lifeless, conventional boy of fashion; and find a playmate in the bright, hearty, it may be rough boy from the middle class or from the home of poverty?—New England Magazine.

Mrs. Bragg mother of Edna Bragg whose body was found in Charles river has identified the body by the clothing and jewelry. The body was discovered by boys. The face was so distorted by swelling and contact with oyster shells as to be unrecognizable.

Beware of Ointments for Catarrh that contain Mercury,

as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them.
Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury and can be taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure he is sure to get the genuine. It is taken internally, and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J.

AJAX LINIMENT
is making a record never attained by any other Liniment which has been placed upon the market for the relief and cure of

RHEUMATISM
It has cured of long standing. A lady in this city writes that she was troubled with inflammatory rheumatism so that she could not get out of bed for weeks or even bear the weight of a sheet upon her limbs without suffering intense pain, and had spent many dollars trying various so-called cures and found no relief or cure until her husband brought home a bottle of

AJAX LINIMENT.
The first application gave immediate relief and after using three bottles she was entirely cured. Why suffer when you can get relief with

AJAX LINIMENT
for only 25 cents? If your druggist does not keep it, write us at once, and we will send a bottle on receipt of price. WHITTLESEY &

Cromwell's Parliament.
The accidental coincidence has not often been mentioned, of the meeting of Oliver Cromwell's "Little Parliament," after the close of the English civil war, with the date of the American Declaration of independence. On the 4th of July, 1653, Cromwell's Little Parliament met, under prosperous auspices. They came to the Councill Chamber at Whitehall; and sitting in chairs round a table, the Lord-General (Cromwell), surrounded by his officers, made a speech to the assembly
"full of the same obscurity, confusion, embarrassment and absurdity which appear in almost all Oliver's productions," says Hume. "All glowing with intelligibility, with credibility, with the splendor of genuine veracity, and heroic depth and manfulness," says another writer. "He was an entire stranger to oratorical art, to harmony of composition, and to eloquence of language," says a great writer and orator; but, he adds, "he impelled his auditors with resistless force towards the object which he wished to attain,
by exciting in their minds at every step, the object which it was his object to attain."—Salem Gazette.

Result of a Dream.

About the year 1783 a Bristol plumber named Watts dreamed that he was out in a shower of mottled lead. He observed that the metal came down in spherical drops, and afterward, to find whether it would be so, he went to the top of a church and poured melted metal into a vessel of water below. To his great delight, he found that the lead had gathered into beautifully formed globular balls, and he at once took out a patent.

DEATH'S BRIDAL.

By DAVID KER.

[Copyright, 1891, by American Press Association.]

CHAPTER I. SEEKING DEATH.

"His girl's likeness saved him when he meant to die."

The first day of Gettysburg was over. Northern and southern alike had fought their best, and the dead heaped along the slope of Cemetery hill showed that the contending hosts were worthy of each other. On the northern side every general engaged, save one, had had his horse killed under him. On the southern side General Rhodes, riding up to rebuke an infantry battalion which he saw, as he thought, lying down to escape the Yankee fire, found that they were all corpses fallen in their ranks.

All around the curving line of heights, on which a vast crescent of bright spots marked the northern position, another fiery crescent showed where Lee's men lay encamped in readiness for the morrow's battle, and a reckless fellow of Sickle's division, posted to the left of Howard's position on Cemetery hill, said with a laugh, as he pointed to the far extending lights:

"The Johnnies air seem a good few stars tonight, but I reckon we'll make 'em see some more tomorrow!"

"Guess they may make some of us see 'em, too, 'fore all's up," growled a veteran. "Them rebs kin fight some, so they kin!"

"Dry up, Pete," cried a third man, "you're a worse croaker than 'Never-die Joe' yonder. It's a mercy he's asleep, or we'd have him tellin' us who's to die tomorrow, and makin' us all feel bad."

And the speaker glanced at a man who lay sleeping beside the fire, with his fitful glare playing spectrally on his upturned face. Bronzed and weather worn as it was, that face was as delicate of outline as a woman's, and haunted all who saw it with a vague suggestion of one of the handsome, high bred, ill fated cavaliers of Charles I.

"He allers sleeps like that jist 'fore a fight," said one man in an awestricken whisper: "the only time he's happy is when he thinks he's gwine to die!"

"Darn my skin if I know what to make of him," added a second—a huge, heavy, good natured giant from Illinois. "He'd whip Old Nick himself at fightin'—he whipped me once, as you know, and 'tain't every man kin do that; and he mout 'a' been promoted a dozen times over if he'd liked. But no, not he! he allers says he wants nothin' but to die!"

"Well, it's rough on him if he can't find no kind Christian to oblige him in a liddle thing like that. When I'm a-gwine to die I don't mind changin' with him, or maybe the general 'ud hang him as a great favor if he was to beg hard."

"He's a queer sort, that's a fact. He looks like a gal and talks as soft as a child, but in battle, by thunder, he's!"

"Like the devil wid a toothache!" broke in a deep Irish voice.

"Hello, Mike, are you there! Say, boys, do you remember how Mike said 't'other night that he didn't fear man or devil, and jist then an old cow poked its horns over the fence and went 'Moo-oo-oo!' and down goes Mike on his knees and sings out, 'Forgive me, Misther Satan, I didn't mane you!'"

"Och, beaisy, ye vagabone!" retorted Mike O'Reilly. "Sure, when I hit yez from behind wid a hot pratie, didn't ye scream out: 'Lord have mercy on my soul! I'm shot!'"

Amid the silence that followed the laugh which ensued, the slumbering man by the fire, speaking in his sleep, was heard to say in cold and haughty tones: "Apparently your royal highness does not remember me."

And then, with a struggle and a violent start, the sleeper awoke.

"Sure, is it the Prince of Wales he's talkin' to?" cried Mike, staring. "'Twas royal highness he said anyhow. Who is he, thin, at all, at all?"

But the mysterious Joe, without seeming even to hear him, rose and went straight up to the big Illinoisan and held out his hand.

"Dick," said he, with an unconscious dignity that impressed even the rude fellow to whom he spoke, "we had a fair fight, and I hope you bear me no grudge for it, as I'm sure I bear you none. Shake hands, and let us be friends tonight, for tomorrow one of us two must die!"

"You didn't happen to hear which one, Joe?" faltered the giant, who evidently put full faith in his comrade's strange prophecy, as indeed did all the rest, judging by their looks of awe.

"No," said the other wearily, "but I know which I wish it may be."

Somehow the talk and laughter flagged after that, and the group melted away in silence.

It was five o'clock in the evening of the following day. The July sun loomed dimly through a vast cloud of smoke, and the air shook with the deep, unslackening roar of two hundred southern guns, mingled with the ceaseless crash of the boughs torn by the pelting shot from the trees along the Yankee line. The second of the three great Confederate assaults was at hand, and Sickle's and his gallant few, in their advanced position, were about to bear the brunt of it.

Foremost among his comrades stood

"Never-die Joe," calm and silent as ever, but with the light of a strange and terrible joy in his deep gray eyes. Only amid the storm of battle and the shadow of doom could that restless spirit—ever seeking death with an ardor the secret of which no man knew—hope to find peace and such a storm was about to burst upon him now as even he had never witnessed yet.

Suddenly the cannonade ceases, and then the air rings with the ear piercing yell of the southern war cry, and the northern soldiers see dimly through the rolling smoke a huge dark gray wave, crested with a glittering spray of bayonets, come surging up the slope straight toward their lines.

And now the Federal artillery speaks out in its turn, and the sharp crackle of small arms mingles with the thunder of the cannon. Men fall at every step in the ranks of the charging column, and down goes Hood himself, struck by a bullet, but the rush of Longstreet's men comes on unchecked, and bursts into the foremost battery like a waterfall.

And, after that, all is like the whirl of a troubled dream. A wild vision of fierce faces and tossing arms, half seen through billowy smoke—a furious clamor of mingled cries—a hot, stifling reek of dust and gunpowder—a wild beat longing to tear and kill, tingling to the very finger tips of every man in the melee.

The guns are taken—the defenders are driven back—and then comes a desperate rally, and the figure of "Never-die Joe" is seen for a moment in the forefront of the fight, whirling his clubbed rifle round his head like a flail, and striking right and left with the strength of a giant. Then the pall of smoke closes round him, and he is seen no more.

The men in gray press on—the men in blue, stubbornly contesting every foot of ground, are forced back step by step—when all at once a deep voiced shout peals forth from the rear, and the dashing Hancock and his men come up at a run to restore the fight. There is a flash of leaping flame through the smoke, like lightning playing in a cloud—a fierce, short spasm of hand-to-hand battle—a swaying to and fro of struggling masses of bluecoats and graycoats, like conflicting waves—and then the tide of assault wavers, rolls back and ebbs sullenly away.

"As sure as my name's Bill Slocum," said one of two men who were going over the battle field with lanterns a few hours later, "we'll find him alive yet. Don't ye remember how, at Chancellorsville, he was the only man left out of a hull comp'ny? Seems to me, Mike, as Death's someways like a woman; when you run arter him he fights shy and slides off; but the minute you begin to look as if you didn't care for his comp'ny, up he comes right away!"

"It's I that 'ud be glad to believe that same," growled O'Reilly, "but didn't I see him fall wid my own two eyes?"

"What of it?" said Bill consolingly. "I guess he was only wounded, anyhow. You mustn't call any man dead, Mick, till he's bin returned as sitch on the ficial list o' killed and wounded."

"Troth, it's aisy to talk," rejoined Mike ruefully, "but hasn't many a dacent boy thought himself only wounded when he was dead all the time?"

Bill's broad laugh at this splendid "bull" was suddenly checked by the sight of Illinois Dick's mighty form lying lifeless, with upturned face, upon a heap of dead.

"Joe's bin a true prophet, I reckon. He said either he or poor old Dick was bound to die. Well, if Dick's dead, Joe must be alive, and I guess he ain't far off, neither, for it was jist somewheres round here as I seed him last. Hello! here's one reb livin' yet, anyway. How do, Johnny? How d'ye feel?"

"Kind o' shaky, I reckon," said the southerner, with a faint laugh.

"Thry a drop o' this, me boy," cried Mike, offering his canteen; "it'll do yez more good than anny medicine, bad luck to that same dirty stuff! Troth, 'twas an illigant lick ye got," added he, eying admiringly a fearful gash on the fallen man's head—"purty enough for ould Donnybrook, anny day!"

"That's so," said the Confederate, seemingly revived by his draught. "The last lick he giv' wur the one I got, and I don't want to order no more at the same store, I tell yez! He wur a tall Yank, with a smooth face that looked like a putty gal, and fit like forty wildcats!"

"By thunder! that must 'a' bin Joe hisself!" cried Bill eagerly. "Say, Johnny, what becomed of him, annyway?"

"Dead, I reckon—and lucky for us, too, else he'd 'a' laid out our hull battalion single handed. We hollered to him to surrender when he wur left all alone right in among us all; but it warn't a mite o' use. He jist clinched his teeth and kept hammerin' away with his clubbed piece, same as if he wur thrashin' corn, till at last Tom Wiley hed to shoot him jist to be done with it."

"And here he is," cried Slocum, whose keen eye had been scanning the surrounding corpses while the man was speaking. "Hello! what's this? Great Scott! his hand's warm!"

"Warm, is it? Hurroo!" shouted O'Reilly, with a true Tipperary yell. "He's alive, thin—devil a less! Hurroo!"

"Steady, Mick," said his cooler comrade; "we want to handle him carefully, you know, if he's badly hit. Hello! is the feller's skin bullet proof? Here's a ball in his clothes as flat as a buckwheat cake! Show a light, Mick."

O'Reilly held up the lantern, and the marvel was at once explained.

Hidden in the breast of the soldier's shirt was a flat metal case, which had stopped the ball that would otherwise have reached his heart. As Bill touched it it came open in his hand, disclosing the sunny hair and sweet, pure face of a beautiful American girl.

"Think o' that, now!" muttered Bill Slocum with an unwonted softness in his deep, hoarse tones. "His girl's likeness saved him when he meant to die! Jist let me catch any feller sayin' there ain't no God arter that!"

And Mike O'Reilly, with the instinctive chivalry of his warm hearted Irish nature, put the miniature gently back in its place and drew the unconscious man's bullet torn clothing carefully over it, saying simply:

"'Twas himself that thried to kape it hid, and he must niver know that anny one saw it."

CHAPTER II. AT THE LAST MOMENT.

"I see him!" cried the viscount.

"What a savage that old man must be!" muttered an eminent New York doctor, issuing from a flushed face from a splendid room in one of the largest up town hotels late on the same night that witnessed "Never-die Joe's" resurrection. "His relations, if he has any, ought to be glad to get rid of him—as they will pretty soon, for he can't live through the night. If this is a fair sample of the British aristocracy, I shall be more than ever thankful that I'm an American."

And well might he say so, for these words, uttered by a voice harsh and broken with pain, followed him through the doorway:

"You doctors are quacks and impostors, every man of you! What did those wretched fools know who sent me over here to die, instead of regaining my health, as they said I should do? And as for you, have you any medicine that can soothe this pain for a moment, or retard my death for a single hour? Not you! Be off with you, then, and leave me to die unmolested!"

The hired nurse, dismissed in the same polite fashion, had hurried out of the room likewise, glad to escape, and the doomed man was left alone with his own black and bitter thoughts.

With what were those thoughts busy as he lay there in his lonely weariness and pain beneath the deepening shadow of the grave? Did he look back for half a century through the gloomy vista of a wasted life to see himself once more the handsome, dashing, reckless young viscount who had been the wildest and wickedest rone at the evil court of George IV? Did he live again through the cruel disappointments and mad debaucheries that had doomed him to a premature age and a torturing death?

Did he stand once more by the deathbed of his only daughter, cut off in the first bloom of her girlhood by a cruel disease? Or did he see in fancy the handsome, imperious face of his only son, banished from his home forever for daring to thwart his tyrant father's plan of a "good match" for him by giving his heart to the beautiful but penniless American orphan, who had been his sick sister's teacher, companion and only friend?

And was this the end of it all? What did all his wealth and all his rank profit him now? Surrounded by useless luxuries, which seemed only to mock his misery; old, worn out, childless, hated by all who knew him, he was dying the death of a wounded wild beast in his den. All his life long he had been bent on having his own way, and this was whither his own way had led him.

"How all my tenants will clap their hands," he growled, "and shout that the devil has got his own at last! And how the next heir, curse him! will chuckle over all the rich lands that the old bear has had to leave behind him! By Heaven, if I could blow up the castle and burn the whole estate, and leave him nothing to inherit but dust and ashes, I'd do it! Ah! if Arthur had not disobeyed me I should not be left to die like this, alone and uncared for! Perhaps I may have been to blame too, but it is too late to think of that now—too late!"

"Never too late!" said a clear, sweet voice behind him; and in the doorway stood a young girl, looking down upon him with a deep, womanly pity in her beautiful face which made it seem lovelier than ever. This was the girl whom he had hated and cursed as the cause of his son's disobedience, but whom he had none the less kept in his household as having been the chosen friend of his dead daughter, the only being whom he had ever really loved.

"Hal!" muttered the viscount, "are you come to see me die like a dog? Well, if you want your revenge, you have it now, to the full."

"I want none," she answered, gliding across the room as noiselessly as a sun beam, and standing beside him. "Won't you let me try if I can do anything to help you?"

"What can you do?" asked the dying man with savage impatience. "I am dying—I know it—and if there be a hereafter, as the priests tell us, I have less to hope for there than here. What does it matter? As I have sown, so must I reap."

"Do not talk so wildly and despairingly," said Constance Leigh earnestly. "It is not too late yet to undo what you have done."

At the last words the sick man's face changed, and he glanced up at her with a sharp, suspicious look.

"Lord Doneraile," said she, with an air of quiet dignity which the fierce old noble himself had never surpassed in his proudest days, "I know what you are going to say, and I must not let you say it. Now that you have but a few hours to live, it is time for me to speak plainly. You thought that I loved you son only because he was rich and great, and you wronged me cruelly in thinking so. I love him better now that he is poor and nameless and forsaken than I ever did when he was heir to the finest estate in the south of Ireland; but if you will forgive him and restore him to his rights, I will pledge you my word—and you know I have never broken it—that I will never see him again."

The viscount eyed her with a look of blank amazement.

ETIQUETTE.

COMMON MISTAKES.

Some Lapses in Politeness Not Unknown Even in the Well Bred.

A common lapse in good breeding, noted by Marion Harland in The Housekeepers' Weekly, is the habit of reluctantly accepting an invitation. If a friend or acquaintance invites you to her house she is bestowing a compliment upon you, and you, as the honored person, should consider it as such.

If you can accept, do so gracefully, not condescendingly. One young man, whose youth must be his only excuse, told an elderly lady that he would like to dine with her, as she wished him to do, but that "business detained him so late at the office that he would have to disappoint her." She manifested her genuine ladyhood by not smiling at the patronizing declination.

When forced to refuse an invitation do so regretfully, expressing your thanks for the thought of you and your sorrow that circumstances will render your acceptance impossible. But when you can accept do it heartily and unconditionally. What woman does not know the satisfaction of a frank "I thank you I will, with pleasure?"

"Another failure to be avoided," says the authority quoted, "is that of undue familiarity. A Christian man once told me that he never felt more like committing murder than when an acquaintance attracted his attention by slapping him on the back. 'The laying on of hands' in this sense should be a seldom taken liberty, and if ever done it be only to the members of one's household. Looked at in this way, familiarity breeds contempt, for it is very hard to help despising a man or woman who presumes upon acquaintance ship and becomes free and easy." Entering a room without knocking, asking "From whom is your letter?" or "To whom are you writing?" How much did you pay for that thing?" are all so rude that it is a marvel that ordinarily well bred people should ever be guilty of them."

Tea Ice Cream.

This is quite English. Pour over four tablespoonsful of old Hyson tea a pint of cream, scald in a custard kettle, or by placing the can containing it in a kettle of boiling water, remove from the fire and let it stand five minutes, strain it into a pint of cold cream, put it on to scald again, and when hot mix with four eggs and three-quarters of a pound of sugar well beaten together, let it cool, then freeze.

"You will do that, you?" said he in an incredulous tone.

"I will, so help me God!" replied Constance solemnly.

"There is one person in the world, then, who is not utterly selfish," growled the old man, cynical to the very last. "Well, I believe you, and I'll give you a proof of it. Look in the pocket of my dressing gown and you'll find a letter, which I had just received when this cursed attack came on. You can read it."

Constance did so. Short as the letter was, it sufficed to make her face flush and her whole frame quiver with excitement, and hardly pausing to read the last word, she moved swiftly across the room, and taking the dying man's cold hand in both her own said pleadingly:

"You will have him sought for, will you not, now that you know where to search for him?"

"Who knows if he is still alive? The men of our race know how to die when life has nothing left to offer them," said the old noble with a kind of dreary pride.

"He is alive—I feel it," said the girl emphatically. "And he will be found. See how this news of him has come to you just in time, as if sent by God himself. If you know the very regiment in which he enlisted (and this officer seems quite sure of what he says) it will be easy to trace him."

"But whom can I send to do it? It is not every one who could be tempted even by money to venture into the midst of a raging war, and pass through a country that has been turned into a desert, with the risk of being shot or hanged at every step. Who will undertake the search?"

"I will!"

"You?" cried the viscount, "a young girl like you? Impossible!"

"Why should I not?" said Constance simply. "In time of war a woman can often pass where a man cannot, and no American woman has any harm to fear when she goes among American men, whether northern or southern."

As she spoke her fair young face lighted up with a glow of heroic daring that quite transfigured it for the moment, and made the sick man's heavy eyes turn to her with a look of wondering admiration.

"You are indeed worthy of him," said he, seeming to catch a spark of her enthusiasm; "and if thanks or blessings are worth anything from me you have them both. But if you take up this search, how do you mean to set about it?"

"I have had plenty of practice in nursing, as you know; and just now nurses with any experience are very much wanted everywhere. I shall make my way south, and volunteer to help in the hospitals; and I have no fear but what I shall be accepted."

The old man seemed to meditate for a few moments, and then he drew a long breath, as if bracing himself for some final effort, and said more firmly:

"Yes, that will doubtless be the best plan; but, in any case, you must not go alone. Take my man Dawson with you; he's a sharp fellow, with plenty of courage; he may be useful to you in case of need. Now, hand me that cordial on the table; I must keep up my strength, for I have much to do yet, and little enough time left to do it in."

The peasants of Munster were wont to say that the "bad Fortescues," as they expressedly called the wild race to which the viscount belonged, had "always the most life in him just when they were going to die;" and this saying was as true of the last Lord Doneraille as of his terrible forefathers. Propped up with pillows, he wrote rapidly for nearly half an hour without once pausing to rest, while the sick room was a scene of incessant though perfectly noiseless bustle—people coming and going, servants gliding off on errands or returning from them, and Constance Leigh herself standing ready to give to the invalid the various things for which he asked from time to time.

At length all seemed to be done, and the old man, sinking back exhausted on his pillow, said faintly:

"I have done as you asked me, Constance; are you satisfied?"

The girl's only answer was to bend over him and kiss his forehead; but that simple, childlike caress said more than any words.

Then followed a long silence, broken at length by the low and feeble voice of the dying man:

"You look tired, my poor child; will you not go and rest?"

"I won't leave you," she answered simply; and another long pause ensued, in the dead hush of which was heard the ghostly tick of the clock, marking off the last moments of that wasted life. In the subdued light the strongly marked face that lay powerless back on the pillow began to assume a weird likeness to the fleshless outline of a skull, and Constance Leigh, though as brave as any soldier who had fought that day at Gettysburg, felt herself shrinking instinctively from what seemed like the visible presence of death.

At last the sick man spoke again, in a voice which was now barely above a whisper:

"Will you pray for me, Constance? I cannot, for it would be like a coward to cry for mercy, now that I am helpless, after having laughed at such things all my life when I was strong and full of health, but if there is a God, he will surely hear such prayers as yours."

And Constance did pray for him with all her heart and soul. She forgot the countless insults hurled at her by this man's bitter tongue—his mean suspicions of her, the cruel wrong that she and her lover had suffered at his hands, and remembered only that he was dying, and that he had no one to care for him or to love him.

Another draught of the cordial revived the failing man once more, and he spoke with all his wonted firmness:

"When you find him—for find him you will—tell him I forgive him, and ask him to forgive me; and when you are happy together—"

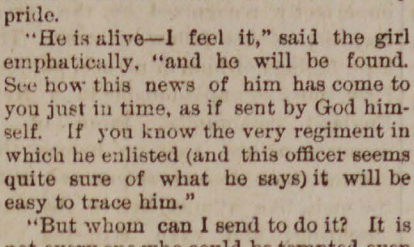

He broke off suddenly, and the girl, looking at him, saw that he had lifted his head and seemed to be gazing intently, not at her, but at something behind her. Then she remembered that the "bad Fortescues" were credited with the gift of second sight, and though she put no faith in the weird superstition, it awoke her in spite of herself.

"I see him," cried the viscount; "he is alone among them all, but they cannot kill him—he lives still! The first peril is past, but the second is still to come. It comes! He has escaped it; but the third peril—the third!"

And with that bitter cry on his lips the "wild Lord Doneraille" sank back and died.

CHAPTER III. GENERAL SHERMAN.

The news that the general gave her was far from reassuring.

"Guess Bill Sherman's a daisy, so he is! Three hundred miles of marchin' through a country where there's no roads, and where the hull place has bin eaten as bare as an apple orchard when there's boys around, ain't as easy as eatin' a biscuit, that's a fact!"

"You bet it ain't—specially when it's raining like old Harry all the time!"

"And when them rebs air buzzin' around with their cavalry, just like a swarm o' skeeters! D'y remember, boys, what a time they gave us 'way down by Tuscumby 'fore we cud drive 'em off?"

"That's so. When the old man got Grant's order to march some fellers said 'twas 'lar impossible, but I reckon Uncle Billy can't find that word in his dictionary, nowhow! Bully for Sherman!"

"Steady, Sam—here comes one o' them hospital ladies. Off with yer caps, boys!"

The "hospital lady" whom these brave fellows saluted with such chivalrous respect was no other than Constance Leigh herself, still searching for her lost lover, and searching in vain.

Since that memorable July night she had passed through many a fearful scene of suffering and death, and had heard from many of her patients strange tales of the man that she sought, whose reckless daring and romantic mystery had made his name familiar to many who had never seen his face. But war and disease had wrought such havoc among the soldiers of Gettysburg that not till that very morning had she met one of the actual comrades of the man whom they knew only as Joe Joliffe, or "Never-die Joe."

Toiling in Chattanooga amid a host of sick and wounded—the wrecks of the fatal field of Chickamauga—she had remarked one face in that ghastly throng which, wan and wasted though it was, had a look of bright, boyish drollery very strange to see amid such a carnival of horrors. It was honest Mike O'Reilly, with a ball through his leg and a fearful saber gash in his shoulder, but still retaining his light hearted Irish jollity so wholly unimpaired by pain and weakness that the amazed surgeon declared that he had "kept death at bay by laughing him out of countenance."

"Faith, it's myself that's in luck to be under shelter," said he cheerily, in reply to her condolences, "for it's the worst of all weather we've bin havin' here, glory be to God! It's all like this 'd' a dale rather have no weather at all! At daydawn it's as cold as a landlord's heart, and ye on wid yer coat for the bare life. Thin out comes the sun and melts ye all away, and makes yer clothes cling to yer till ye fale like a pound o' butter rowled up in an old newspaper; and ye off wid the coat agin, and rowl it up, and on ye thramp. Thin, havin' got yer beyant yer intrenchments, so to spake, down comes the rain on ye like the devil, and wets ye thru and thru to the bone; and when ye do git to shelter the sun takes a mane advantage of yer absence to come out agin."

"Ye're a bit of a philosopher, I see, Mr. O'Reilly," said Constance, smiling in spite of herself at the soldier's quaint humor.

"Och, my lady, call me 'Mike,' as ye please, and don't be after sayin' 'Misther O'Reilly.' Sure, it sounds as iv I wor a gentleman, which I'm not, thank God, and niver will be!"

"Why, what a terrible radical you must be, Mike," said the young lady, smiling again.

"Troth, iv ye'd had as much to do wid gentlemen as Oi have, it's yer own swate self 'ud be a radical too. The ownly gentleman I iver knowed that was good for anything was my ould comrade, Joe Joliffe, that we called 'Never-die Joe.'"

"Do you know him, then?" she asked, trembling with excitement.

"Know him, is it? Faith, didn't he give me his ould blanket on a murderin' cold night, that froze the very thoughts in my head? and didn't him an' me fight shoulder to shoulder many a day, when ye cudn't open yer mouth to brathe without dhravin' in half a dozen bullets? My rear rank man, Bill Slocum, thrived to make me believe that the decent boy was only one o' them runaway kings from Europe; but I knowed he was too good to belong to any sich bla'guards, I'll go bail he's 'come o' decent poble,' like St. Patrick in the ould song, and niver had a king in his family at all, at all!"

"And where is he now?" asked Constance eagerly.

"But that was more than Mike could say. He only knew that Joe had bin detached on special duty as a scout, havin' shown a wonderful aptitude for that kind of work, and where he was now no one could say. He might be in the camp, or he might be a hundred miles away."

Having learned, however, that Joliffe was now acting as a scout, and well-known in that character, Miss Leigh had now something definite to go upon, and after a persistent inquiry—in which she was zealously aided by the surgeons and various officers, who interested themselves warmly in her quest—a man was found who had seen Joe Joliffe making for Sherman's camp on the south side of Chattanooga upon the previous day. Constance at once started in the same direction, accompanied as usual by that model servant, Mr. Dawson, who had followed her as closely as her shadow ever since her departure from New York.

"His late lordship's orders to me, miss," said he with a prim bow, "was to attend you wherever you went, and accordingly it's my dooty to do so."

General Sherman had just come up by a forced march from Bridgeport along the north bank of the Tennessee to Chattanooga, after a fifty days' struggle through mud and rain from Vicksburg via Memphis and Tusculum. Sent for in haste to assist in Grant's projected attack upon Bragg's strong lines on Look-out mountain, he had been intrusted with the duty of storming the heights of Missionary Ridge, at the foot of which his men were now encamped.

At such a time the great commander, with his usual untiring energy and wonderful activity, was "everywhere at once," and it was no easy matter to know where to find him; but a young officer to whom Constance addressed herself was able to tell her that the general had spent the whole night in visiting the outposts, and would probably be met with on that side of the camp which faced toward Missionary Ridge.

Under his escort Constance made her way thither, and went to and fro for some time without seeing or hearing anything of the general, when a rough fellow belonging to a picket that had just been relieved pointed to a solitary figure lying asleep on the ground under a tree wrapped in a long cavalry cloak, and said with a coarse laugh:

"See, boys, that's the way we're managed—commanded by drunken officers!"

The rough jest seemed to act like an electric shock upon the sleeper, who awoke at once, rose from the ground to the full height of his towering stature, and throwing back his cloak said quietly:

"I'm not drunk, my friend, only a little sleepy after a week's watching."

The startled jester drew back as if he had trodden on a snake, and slunk off, muttering in a tone of dismay:

"Je-revsalem! It's Uncle Billy himself!" (A fact.)

Constance Leigh herself was equally amazed, for she had seen too many likenesses of that grand, rugged face, with its massive forehead, iron jaw and deep, earnest eye, not to recognize at a glance the man who was already famous throughout the whole world, though his greatest exploits were still to come—William Tecumseh Sherman. But there was a kindly look in those keen eyes that had looked death in the face so often which at once dissipated

WE GRATEFULLY acknowledge an invitation to be present at the laying of the corner stone of the new building for "The New York Mail and Express," at high noon the 19th inst.

The building which is to be a mammoth structure will be a monument of the enterprise and success of one of the brightest dailies published.

RUMORS of the resignation of Secretary Noble from the Cabinet have been afloat this week and it has been intimated that the Secretary can have either the justiceship of the eighth circuit or a foreign commission. President Harrison, however, flatly denies the stories. It is also rumored that the Attorney General, Commissioner of Pensions and others have resigned, but all the stories stand on the same flimsy foundation of mere rumor. Each is denied by the interested parties.

THE INDICTMENT by the New York Grand Jury, of James Gordon Bennett for publishing an account of the recent electrocutions is apparently made to test the constitutionality of the law and ascertain how far the freedom of the press may be abridged by legislative censorship or proscription.

The law in question, while perhaps praiseworthy in some aspects, would, if sustained, prove a menace to the time honored liberties of the press. If such items of news can be suppressed by authority of law, there would appear to be no limit to which the doctrine could not be carried. The way would thus be opened to establish a censorship over the publication of news that would be as far reaching and detrimental to public welfare as any created by monarchial despotism.

The issue of the case will be watched by the whole country with more than common interest.

A SESSION of the Executive Committee of the National Republican Committee was held in Washington this week, when considerable discussion of presidential possibilities was indulged. Secretary Blaine, who was reported to the committee as much improved in health, and good for ten years more of political life, was uppermost in the minds of all present. Despatches state that Harrison was treated in the discussions as if already out of the race.

Broad insinuations are thrown out that Harrison will recognize the clamor which proceeds from certain wings of the party for Blaine, and actually take himself out of the line of contest before a great while.

After discussion of the regular business, the resignations of Duclay and Quay were presented. The session this week was the last they will attend unless they change their minds before their resignations are accepted in November, at the meeting of the general committee, and conclude to withdraw them.

Clarkson succeeds to the directorship of the committee, and it is generally understood that the retiring members will continue their influence in its councils through him.

The November meeting it is thought will appoint May as the time for the National Convention.

THE GREATEST piece of impudence of modern times is the demand for a pension for ex-slaves. In an address delivered in the Metropolitan Methodist (colored) church at Washington, last Sunday evening, Mr. W. R. Vaughn made a vigorous appeal to the colored people of the United States to use the powers vested in them to secure what he claimed to be due the race for having built up the country by slave labor.

He claimed that the country belonged to the soldier and the ex-slaves, but was careful to claim the spoils for the ex-slave first. His modest demand is $400,000,000.

It is in order next for the free white laborers of the North and West who for generations have received no greater compensation than the slave, (a mere living), to present claims for incalculable billions. The same scheme of bonding which Mr. Vaughn proposes will answer for the payment. Mr. Vaughn says he proposes to make it a life work to secure the passage of a bill by Congress for the purpose referred to, and spend his $130,000, fortune if necessary in accomplishing his object. His five sons are also to be sacrificed to the same beneficent scheme. If the promulgator is not an out and out crank it is very probable the scheme was hatched to thwart the G. A. R. claims for service pension.

ESSEX COUNTY.

The tax rate of Topsfield is $11.00 this year.

The Elks of Lynn took an outing at Lynnfield Thursday.

E. D. Russell of Waltham has been elected principal of the Lynn High School.

More than 200 families are stopping at Asbury Grove.

A company with a capital of $60,000 is to erect a shoe factory at West Newbury. The capital is then to be increased to $100,000.

Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Waite of Hamilton observed the 35th anniversary of their marriage by a reception to their friends at their residence on Monday evening.

Prof. J. M. English of Newton will preach at the dedication of the Second Baptist church at Beverly Farms next Sunday.

Miss Myra Winship of Lynn read an essay on "Remembrance" at the reunion of the graduates of the Stroughtonham Institute, held at Lake Massapoag on Tuesday.

The Rockport Granite Company has been awarded the contract for furnishing Boston with three hundred thousand paving blocks for $77.65 per thousand.

Among this week's patents are the following: Norman C. Bassett, Lynn, armature for motors and generators; Abram L. Coombs, Saugus, stay cutting attachment for sewing machines.

A leak was discovered on Monday night in Brown's dry goods store at Lynn, after the floor had upon it two inches of water. The loss would have been very serious in a short time more.

A two horse team was struck by a train at Ballardvale crossing on Tuesday, when the wagon was demolished and one of the horses killed. The driver saved himself by jumping off.

The following constitute the Haverhill water commissioners: W. H. Moody, J. A. Huntington, A. M. Allen, D. T. Kennedy and Woodbury Noyes. They will take charge of the old aqueduct company's works, and no doubt improve them.

F. B. Reed of Topsfield is reported to have assaulted Fred Smerige of Danvers quite severely on Monday. There was a collision of teams, and Reed was much excited, declaring that Smerige would never drive another load of wood until he paid the damages.

The work of dredging Manchester river by the government has been completed, and dredging a channel from main channel to Beach street, 20 feet wide, with 2 feet of water at low tide, has been commenced. This is done by private subscription at a cost of $900.

Schr. Wm. Morrissey is "high line" of the Gloucester fishermen this far. She weighed off 290,585 pounds of fish, valued at $10,537.25. The average share is $271.37. If all the hardy fishers could fare as well, they would have something to show for the hardship they endure.

On Monday noon, while Manager Frost was at dinner, the office of the Union Loan Co., 65 Washington street, Haverhill, was entered by forcing a window, and gold watches, rings, etc., valued at $400 were taken. In the middle of the day and in the busiest section of the city, this robbery appears bold.

A man who pleaded guilty of assault in the Gloucester police court Wednesday, requested the judge, if he sent him to jail, to send him to State prison, or house of correction or some other institution than Salem jail, as he knew a man there whom he did not wish to see him in his present condition.

At Salisbury Beach on Saturday a little child got into a chest and the lid came down and fastened her in. Her outcries were heard, and her mother at first thought she had got into the chimney, but finally the cries grew fainter and the chest was opened and she was found lying in the face and almost dead. She could not have lived many minutes longer.

Miss May Swain, residing in Beverly, had a narrow escape from death on Tuesday, at the stitching room of S. F. Crossman, corner of Bow and Rantoul streets. Her clothing got caught in the set screw on the shafting, and she was being drawn into the machinery, when her dress gave way, and she escaped with a sprained ankle, some bruises, and possibly internal injuries. She will be laid up for a time, but it is thought no permanent effects will be felt.

Sunday afternoon an employee of the Forest River lead mills succeeded in capturing the shark that has been about the place recently. The fish was landed with a harpoon after a hard struggle.

Salem is to have a series of six band concerts, commencing the 4th at 7.30 o'clock and occurring weekly.

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Sidney C. Bancroft.

In the death of Sidney C. Bancroft, which occurred at Baker's Island last Tuesday, probably the finest mind that the town has known for a generation was released from earthly limitations. As is often the case, the fact was very imperfectly recognized by the great majority of his fellow citizens. The little failings of human nature, particularly those so unpardonable in a New England community, those of a financial nature, rose up before the eyes of those locally acquainted with the man, like a mist before the sun, obscuring, and even eclipsing its brightness. Now that the frost of death has dissipated the cloud we may recognize the fact that here was the mental power that would have adorned any position of public trust. It is no pride-inspiring commentary upon the working of our boasted system of government that, suave and compliant mediocrity, or worse, servile panders to the lowest elements permitted a vote by the weakness of our franchise laws, reap rich rewards of public favor, while pre-eminent fitness and ability gain scant recognition at the polls. Probably no one will now deny that Mr. Bancroft could have honored and dignified any office in the gift of his community in a manner superior to any of his townsmen. And there was never any sufficient reason why he should not have received some of these places of honor. Lack of money was his most grievous offence and the prime cause of the abuse heaped upon him. Had he suddenly fallen heir to a sum no larger than the cost of a rich man's yacht for a single season would it not have condoned all his alleged offences?

Before the war, he projected what was, for the time, a great speculation. It failed and, it is thought by his friends, wrecked not only his financial fortune, but even his ambition. Unsettled him, apparently, for the persistent, unrelenting labor of an aim in life, and made him undervalue the rewards of such labor. He grew to be fond of dilatoriness and procrastination. He used laughingly to say, "My motto is never to do today what I can put off until tomorrow." What are considered the prizes of life seemed to him hardly worth the price that must be paid for them. In all this perhaps he was wiser than the world, yet those who were near him and daily felt the charm of his genial, equal disposition; of the versatility, purity and range of his conversation, of his freedom from all the ordinary vices of mankind, and above all, of his wonderful intellectual equipment, could not but deplore that this great light could not shine where it should be seen of all men.

"His," as Webster says, "were not the graces taught in the schools." He depended but little upon the learning supposed to be stored by the pupil in regular educational courses. From the Bridgewater Normal School, of which he was a graduate, he had received the tools with which to mine learning rather than the learning itself, and we would not wish to use them. No man in public or private, in the assembly or at the bar, ever encountered him without recognizing a courteous and powerful opponent, who compelled respect and admiration. Any lawyer of the Essex Bar will admit that this unassuming and unambitious man could easily keep a place at the front when he chose. His legal reputation in other counties of the state was of the highest, and he would often put more wit, humor and learning into a police court hearing than would suffice for an important case in the higher tribunals.

As a parliamentarian, he had few equals, and, perhaps, no superiors. His cool self-possession, his quickness of thought, his wide experience and his profound study of parliamentary authorities, made him almost unequalled as a presiding officer over large assemblies, and perhaps his greatest laurels have been won in this capacity. Eternal peace and happiness to him now! The frowns or smiles of a fickle world cannot longer disturb him. We, that know him best, cannot but believe that a mind like his has not been annihilated. We confidently trust that freed from all the impediments of earthly surroundings, his spirit will live forever in the high plane for which it was so well fitted and we may be permitted to say with the "Melancholy Dane": "He was a man, take him for all in all, we shall not look upon his like again."

An Extraordinary Legacy.

The will of Mrs. Mary F. Searle of Methuen, widow of Mark Hopkins the California millionaire has been presented to the court at Salem for probate. It bequeathes all her property to her husband Edward F. Searles. After the death of her first husband the testatrix came to Massachusetts, and erected a magnificent dwelling house at Great Barrington said at the time to be the grandest and most expensive exposition of residential architecture in America. The designs were drawn by Mr. Searle whom she afterward married and the house was built by Norcross Brothers, of Worcester, the largest builders and contractors on the continent.

Since the completion of the Barrington house she removed to Methuen, where she erected another costly dwelling, with grounds laid out on the plan of an English manor where she has since resided.

From the phraseology of the will it would appear that her husband made a will in her favor at the same time her will was executed. The estate is estimated at $30,000,000 to $60,000,000.

Peculiar in combination, proportion, and preparation of ingredients, Hood's Sarsaparilla possesses the curative value of the best known remedies of the vegetable kingdom. Peculiar in its strength and economy, Hood's Sarsaparilla is the only medicine of which can be said, "One Hundred Doses One Dollar." Peculiar in its medicinal merits, Hood's Sarsaparilla accomplishes cures hitherto unknown, and has won for itself the title of "The greatest blood purifier ever discovered." Peculiar in its "good name at home,"—there is more of Hood's Sarsaparilla sold in Lowell than of all other blood purifiers. Peculiar in its phenomenal record of cures, Hood's Sarsaparilla has ever attained so rapidly nor held so steadfastly the confidence of all classes of people. Peculiar in the brain-work which it represents, Hood's Sarsaparilla combines all the knowledge which modern research has developed, with many years practical experience in preparing medicines. NOTED AND QUOTED.

The modern American Tories, who were so very certain that nobody in the United States could make tin-plate, because they have no workmen who understand the business, are now enraged because it is proposed to import some men who do know how to work it. The tariff-reform story is true blue. He insists that his own country is at a disadvantage, and that it shall keep so.—Lowell Courier.

In Hartford an order was recently issued closing the Italian fruit stands on Sunday. Now the Italians have retaliated and the proprietors of cigar stores have been notified that they must close on Sunday and drug store proprietors have been notified that they must discontinue selling cigars and confectionery. In eating saloons, too, cigars can no longer be sold to the patrons. Has the Italian contingent no influence?

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican quotes from Mayor Smith's argument for allowing the Hall-Fitzsimmons fight to go on, and condemns our bearded executive for the position he took, advising St. Paul to call him in the next election. We shall see what we shall see at the next election.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Somebody keeps telling the Democratic journals that Foraker and Sherman are in the midst of a war over the Ohio senatorship, each with a dirk up his sleeve. Meanwhile the principals in this awful tragedy appear to be quite chummy; so far as outside appearances go.

Yellow fever is reported in Montreal.

The release of O'Brien and Dillor brings two level-headed leaders of the Irish once more into the councils of the Home Rulers. They have a difficult and embarrassing duty to perform in the attempt to harmonize the two factions of their party. They cannot ignore Parnell, because he will not be ignored, for had he not a single fellower he would still posture as the leader. And use the old phrase, slightly altered, "Ireland—it is I!" But the few who still believe in him are to be won back to the cause which McCarthy represents. The money in Parnell is probably gone, for as Parnell's name is necessary to draw it out he will not give it unless he is to benefit. It is a bad thing for Ireland that such a man as Parnell has managed to get to the place where now he is.—Lynn Item.

When the shoals open the long-delayed Harvard bridge to Cambridge is to be opened also. Already there is a land "boom" all along the river front of the University city.

That Rhode Island emulator of Almy must not be allowed to get away scot free, unless our police and detective experts are ready to confess that, like Othello, "their occupation's gone."—Boston Globe.

The services of Senator Southwick in the Legislature of 1891 were so well performed that his re-election should not be a matter of doubt. The correspondent of the Boston Traveller, who has been looking over the political field, says:—"Hon. B. Frank Southwick, of the Peabody, Danvers and Lynn District, is again named for Senator. His record in the Senate on all important questions was such as to find ready endorsement by the Republicans of his district and they now wish to see him returned to a position he has filled with so much credit. He is an able and safe man to represent a constituency engaged so largely in manufacturing and other industrial pursuits. This seems to be the opinion of all with whom the Traveller correspondent has conversed." The same opinion is expressed here and it is a satisfaction to his constituents that their Senator deserves such commendation.—Lynn Item.

NEWS SUMMARY.

Ex-Governor Paul Dilling has died at Waterbury, Vermont, Monday, at the age of 91 years and 11 months. He was a member of Congress in 1844 and governor in 1865 to '67.

Frank C. Almy, the murderer of Christie Warden, seems to be almost omnipresent. He is seen (?) in about every town in New England.

Hon. Q. R. Mills addressed 2000 people at Prohibition Park, Staten Island, on "Democratic Creeds," Wednesday evening.

Prominent Democrats met at Springfield this week to arrange for the Worcester convention. They agreed that John W. Corcoran was not strong enough for candidate for Lieut. Gov.

Capt. David Hill of Northampton seems to be their choice. They also decided that Springfield should be allowed a delegate at large at the National convention.

Speaker, Thomas B. Reed of Maine returned from Europe Wednesday. He told the reporters he had "forgotten more about politics than they ever knew." He had not entertained a political thought since his absence.

Three men were killed and several badly injured by the fall of five big smoke stacks and collapse of an unfinished building at the Elba iron works of the Oil Well Supply Co., Pittsburg, on Wednesday. Damage to property was $10,000. Workmen were hoisting iron girders, one of which struck a stack and caused the catastrophe.

A man called on a Lowell photographer and wanted Almy's picture taken this week. He looked like the much-wanted man himself.

About 500 prohibition delegates met at the Maryland convention and nominated Edwin Higgins of Baltimore for Governor. The nominee is a prominent lawyer.

The Superior Court has refused to enjoin the officers of the Royal Ark, as it was considered detrimental to policy holders. The Supreme officers have this week agreed to pay policies maturing first in full, and express confidence that all claim can be met; but if so it will be by very heavy assessments probably.

Representative-elect Bowers of California says that California Republicans would be glad to vote for Blaine's skeleton. This is very likely. The Republican party has so many skeletons in its closet that it is not alarmed at such a little matter.—Boston Globe.

We thank our stars that our party skeletons are so few after all, that they can be kept in a closet.

Joel H. Ehrhardt has resigned the New York collectorship with its $12,000 salary. He says he prefers to retire from a position where he furnishes the bonds, and the first assistant controls the affairs. J. Sloat Fassett of Elmira, has been nominated to succeed to the vacancy.

A Burglar Captured.

This morning about two o'clock, John Wood, the well-known plumber who resides on Main Street, was awakened by hearing glass break. On getting out of bed he received a blow on the head. He immediately grappled with the burglar, and after a terrible struggle succeeded in holding him until his wife obtained help. On being searched at the station, Mr. Wood's watch and wallet was found on his person. He gave the name of Robert Terry. The broken glass proved to be a bottle of Sulphur Bitters which had almost cured Mrs. Wood of rheumatism.—Exchange.

Arnold of Brescia.

The little town of Brescia, at the foot of the Alps, about half way between Verona and Milan, has held a commemoration of its interesting to note with what enthusiasm modern patriotic Italians now look back across a chasm of 700 years to a long forgotten and only recently resuscitated reformer.

Arnold of Brescia was put to death 1155 for "political heresy" by the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa and the English Pope, Adrian IV. His claim to the affectionate reverence of the modern "patriots" lies in the fact that the Brescian reformer, a man of high character and for the times of unworldly statesmanlike insight, suffered martyrdom in the twelfth century for a biblical idea, in which lay the solution of one important section of the problem of Italian freedom and nationality—the idea, namely, of the complete separation of the temporal from the spiritual power, and, by consequence, of the abolition of the temporal power of the papacy.

Arnold of Brescia was a man born out of due time, and his idea, like the corn of wheat, died with him in the semi-barbarous twelfth century, that it might bring forth much fruit in the Nineteenth.—Pall Mall Gazette.

A Simple Remedy.

Hepatic colic is rarely fatal. As no medicine can directly reach the gall bladder, and as the movement of the stone, though slow, is toward the outlet, the most that the profession attempt is to mitigate the pain with morphine, and by the constant application of water as hot as can borne.

A correspondent in New York writes that his mother was cured of a severe attack, thirty years ago, by the use of olive oil; that is now well at the age of eighty four, and that he has since recommended the oil in more than forty cases, and has never known it to fail. He says:

Let the patient take on an empty stomach a half pint of pure olive oil, or as much as he can swallow and retain. Keep the patient as quiet as possible, lying on the back. If nausea occurs, place cloths wet in warm spirits of camphor, or other spirits, over the pit of the stomach, and give a tablespoonful of clear, strong coffee.

The effect is usually noticed in ten hours, when the gallstones pass the patient in the natural way, without pain or annoyance. The oil reduces them from their crystallized form to a soft substance, in consistency about the same as the white of an egg.

We know of no objection to trying the oil, but medical authorities regard supposed gallstones of this kind as only concrete forms of fatty matter such as is sometimes passed in cases of fatty diarrhea.—Youth's Companion.

The President

Of the bank of Waverly, Iowa, says: Sulphur Bitters saved my life. For ten years I suffered from catarrh and liver complaint; lost forty-five pounds and was growing worse rapidly. I lost all faith in medicine, but hearing your Bitters so well recommended, I gave them a trial. Six bottles cured me.—Smith P. Hunt, Waverly, Iowa.

New England's Railroad.

A railroad deal has been consummated by officials of the Long Island and New England roads which provides a new route between Brooklyn, N. Y. and Boston and points in the New England states. Through trains are to run from Brooklyn to Oyster Bay, thence be ferried across Long Island Sound on steamboats to Wilson's Point, and from there run direct to Boston over the Housatonic and New England roads. By taking this route Brooklyn passengers can avoid crossing the East River and going up to the Grand Central depot, which requires an hour's time. The new route it a perfectly feasible one, and will be put in operation about Sept. 1st.

When you want the best medicine ever made, use DANA'S SARSAPARILLA. It will cure you.

The chief struggle between Biblical criticism and the tradition dogma is about the question of innerrancy. No word of Holy Scripture, no sentence of his, toric creed, makes this claim for the Bible. It is a theory of modern dogmatists. Biblical criticism finds errors in Holy Scripture in great numbers these errors are in the circumstantial, and not in the essentials. They do not disturb any doctrine; they do not change the faith and life of the Christian Church. The great reformers, Calvin and Luther, recognized errors in the Scriptures; Baxter and Rutherford were not anxious about them; the greatest theologians of modern Germany, Van Oosterzee, Tholuck Neander, Stier, Lange, Dörner, Delitzsch, do not ignore them. Where is the German scholar of any rank who denies them? British scholars such as Sanday, Cheyne, Driver, Gore, Davidson, Bruce, Dods, Blaikie, American scholars such as Schaff, Fisher, Thayer, Harber, Smyth, Evans, H. P. Smith, Francis Brown, and host of others, frankly point them out. It may be regarded as the consensus of Biblical scholars that the Bible is not inerrant; and yet the dogmatists insist that one error, destroys its inspiration. They battle in death struggle for their dogma because their Bible shares in its defeat. They risk their whole Bible on a single error. One error in natural history, in astronomy, in geology, in chronology, destroys the whole Bible for them. It is now generally admitted that there are errors in the present text, but it is claimed that the original autographs as they first came from their authors were inerrant. But how can they prove this? It is pure speculation in the interest of their dogma. Criticism does not find the number of errors decreasing; they rather increase as we work our way back in the study of manuscripts, version, and citations, and advance in the critical analysis of the literature. It discredits the entire work of criticism to speculate as to another text than the best one we can get after the most patient and painstaking study. Biblical criticism pursues its work in a purely scientific spirit. It will detect, recognize, and point out errors wherever it may find them in Holy Scripture. If the Reformers and Puritans, the great Biblical scholars of the past, have maintained their faith in the Bible notwithstanding the errors they have seen in it. It is improbable that the Biblical critics of our day will be disturbed by them. If any one is disturbed, it will be those who have been misled by the dogmatists to rest their faith on the doctrine of innerrancy. These will ere long find the doctrine a broken reed that will give them a severe fall and shock to their faith, if it does not pierce them to the heart with the bitter agony of perplexity and doubt.—From "The Theological Crisis" by Prof. CHARLES A. BRIGGS, in NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW for July.

DAVID DUDLEY FIELD.

We to-day present to our readers a member of a most remarkable family, David Dudley Field. He is the son of David Dudley Field, a Congregational clergyman who died in Stockbridge, Mass., in 1867. His illustrious son, the subject of our sketch, was born in Haden, Conn. Feb. 13th, 1835. At the age of twenty he graduated at Williams College. Thereupon he studied law with Hermanus Bleeker in Albany, N. Y., completing his studies in New York city, where he was admitted to the Bar in 1855. Soon after he became the partner of Thos. D. Sedgwick. He is the author of a number of articles and pamphlets on law, politics and judiciary reform, which appeared between 1850 and 1855. In January 1850 he submitted his code of civil and criminal procedure to the Legislature and both became laws. In 1857 Mr. Field was appointed by New York State as the head of a commission to prepare a political code, a penal code, and a civil code. These were designed to supersede the unwritten or common laws. In 1865 they were completed, but the State of New York only adopted the penal code while the other two were adopted by other States in part and by California and Dakota in full. Mr. Field has done more for the reform of laws than any other man living, and his famous work, "Outlines of an International Code" has been translated even into the Chinese. Politically he is a staunch Democrat.

A THREE HORSE TEAM.

A Serviceable Arrangement of Poles Illustrated and Described.

A three horse team is often needed on the farm. Ohio Farmer calls attention to the three horse wagon pole shown in the cut, as being better and stronger than many that are often used with three horses. Following is the description:

Three or four years ago I broke my wagon tongue. I bought another and made a three horse tongue out of the old one. I sawed the pole off about four or six inches from the hounds and made a tenon on the end. I took a scantling about 24 inches square and 2 feet 4 inches long, and made a mortice in the middle for the tenon on the pole; also made a small tenon on each end of the crosspieces, as shown in the cut at C. I bolted pieces of iron on the ends of the poles, with holes for the rod R, that goes through the tongue. Also a rod of iron goes through the poles close to the crosspiece. When the bolts are screwed tight it makes the tongue very solid. In the cut, A is the broken tongue, B the front axle of the wagon and P the poles.

The neck yokes are twenty-eight inches long. The middle ring is ten inches from the outer end of each yoke. The rings on the end are fastened with a clip and two rivets. A small ring is welded in each ring to snap the check strap in. The two middle rings are connected by a third ring for the middle horse's strap. I use hip breaching. The length of the poles and their distance apart depend upon the size of horses. My horses weigh 1,100 to 1,200 pounds. I made my poles as short as possible. You can see by the cut of eveners (Fig. 2) that I can hitch short, and bring the load close to the back rod that holds the poles to the wagon. The poles should be wider apart at the ends than at the crosspiece. Mine are twenty-eight inches apart at crosspiece and thirty-six or thirty-eight inches at the ends.

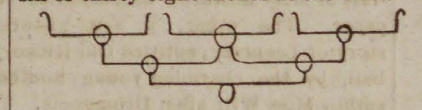

FIG. 2—THREE HORSE POLE.

I use an evener that I use on a sulky plow. This kind of a rig causes the wheels of the wagon to follow the inside feet of the two outside horses and prevents the wheels from getting into ruts, and with the neck yokes described a team can hold back with ease.

Rust in Wheat.

Slight changes in circumstances or conditions of soil or climate sometimes appear to be sufficient to cause rust in a rust resisting variety. Thus Klippart says that the Mediterranean wheat in Ohio escapes rust simply because of its earliness. If sowed late it rusts. He also places several other varieties, such as the Genesee, California, Quaker wheat and May wheat in the same class. Sometimes a variety will rust in one locality but escape in another. Again, a variety may be "rust proof" when first introduced, but by careless, negligent or unskillful treatment it may degenerate or lose its resisting power sufficiently to make it susceptible to the attacks of the rust fungus. A variety may be wholly or nearly exempt from rust and yet have some defect that would render it undesirable even with this good quality, so that actual experiment becomes necessary in ascertaining what are desirable varieties.

How to Break Up a Broody Hen.

An old and experienced breeder tells in The Feathered World how he cures hens of a desire to set. His plan is neither to coop up, nor starve, nor duck in a water butt. What he does—and he finds it an unfailing remedy—is to transfer the broody hen to another pen, with a different lord and master. In a very short time the desire to sit leaves her and she goes on laying within a week or nine days. By adopting this plan he has been spared the nuisance of broody hens when he does not want them.

Trials of Plows.

Trials of plows are among the first investigations undertaken at the Utah experimental station. The results, as just published, show that counters add to the draft, but trucks under the beam lessen it while decreasing the plowman's work. There was a gain of draft when the share was straight upon its base or landside; lengthening the hitch decreases the draft. Walking plows gave less draft than sulky plows with rider; draught increases with depth and with width.

THE WHEAT CROP.

Requirements Necessary to the Production of Large Yields.

The wheat crop flourishes best on a compost clay soil. The best location in an ordinary farm rotation is immediately following a crop of clover or peas or other leguminous crop that tends to store nitrogen in the soil. Nitrogen is an essential element in growing large crops of wheat, and it is the most expensive to buy in a commercial fertilizer. If, therefore, we increase the nitrates in the soil by a previous crop of clover, large crops of wheat can be grown by a liberal application to the crop of a fertilizer containing no ammonia to supply the needed phosphoric acid and potash. It has also been found profitable to add during the season of its spring growth a top dressing of nitrate of soda.

When a clover sod is to be plowed for wheat it should be pastured during the early part of the season, and plowed in July or early in August, since it is found that the success of the crop depends largely upon the soil getting firmly settled after plowing for some time before sowing the wheat. After plowing the field should be harrowed at intervals to prevent the growth of weeds and to get the surface into a fine condition. A thorough preparation of the surface is essential to success.

The crop is usually sown with a drill which distributes the seed in close rows. Of late years some of our best wheat farmers have come to the conclusion that a broadcast seed sower is better than the drill. This is worth experimenting with. It is a great mistake for the farmer to use barely enough fertilizers for the immediate crop of wheat. The crop of clover and grass sown with the wheat is of great importance to the future improvement of the soil, and should be provided for in the application of fertilizers. The time for sowing wheat is usually the last of September to the last of the second week in October. The foregoing is from Powell's "A. B. C. of Agriculture."

Flat Plowing or Lap Furrowing.

Sward land turned over very flat, with the grass side down, does not dry out in fit condition for working in the spring as soon as it would if the furrow were lapped or set up on edge a little more. It is more subject to injury from drought. The alternate wetting and drying, and the exposure to the air, causes quicker decay of the sod, and when that decay is finished, the soil will absorb and hold water from above, or bring up moisture by capillary attraction from below, much better than it would if there were a layer of undecayed vegetable matter six or eight inches below the surface. This difference is not so plainly shown in fall plowed land as in that plowed in the spring, as the sod will have decayed before the season when droughts are most frequent and severe, explains American Cultivator. Flat plowing is not as good as

SALEM, August 1, 1891.

Formal Opening of our Japanese Bazaar Monday, August 3, 1891.

A bit of quaint Japan transported direct to our store. Five months of last winter Mr. Matsuki, our Japanese buyer, was in the home of the almond eyes selecting the thousands of pretty bits that here greet your unaccustomed vision—unaccustomed, for many of the articles and curios which he has brought home are quite unfamiliar to Americans.

All these beautiful things are here now and ready to be seen on Monday.

There are fans and fire screens, portieres and draperies, porcelain and lacquer work, cups and saucers and tea pots of ware and metal, silver ware of curious workmanship and inlaid, tea trays and cabinets, chop sticks and rice bowls, baskets, games, puzzles and toys, paper knives, bon-bon boxes, jewelry, in short every variety of Japanese work and art in silk, paper, wood, porcelain, pottery, lacquer and metal.

It is an almost universal custom to put absurdly high prices on this class of goods, and may be it is necessary for those stores who depend upon indirect and costly methods of procuring them, but we are enabled to price them most reasonably, almost unreasonably low. It almost surprises us; it surely will you, that such things can be made so exquisitely, brought so far, and sold so cheaply.

Mr. Matsuki is here himself in charge and is glad to show and discourse upon the beautiful things from his own country. The national pride is strong in him and there is no sturdier enemy of the Chinese-imitated Japanese wares which flood the market.

A call upon him will be very pleasant, and fully as profitable.

We cordially invite all to come and get a glimpse of Japanese things, inexpressively dainty or absurdly grotesque, as the case may be.

Come Monday.

The Home of Hamlin.

High-perched among the hills of Oxford County, Maine, is the birthplace of the late Hannibal Hamlin, one of the most distinguished citizens of the state. About this illustrious name and around the little village of Paris, cluster many events and noted persons. The villages built upon the summit of a hill of the same name, commanding a view of hill and valley, with the White Mountains as a back ground, their peaks either buried in clouds or standing out in bold relief against the cold blue sky. Hannibal Hamlin's old home is a large square, old-fashioned mansion, on the very verge of the hill, looking over the valley of the Little Androscoggin river, and across to the hills and mountains beyond. It is a beautiful spot, and the visitor loves to watch from the lawn, the silver thread of the river winding through the valley.

As the sun is superior to the stars, so DANA'S is superior to all other Sarsaparillas.

All Their Idols Burned.

Capt. Jack Crawford, the poet scout, who has just returned to Duluth, Minn., from a trip to the northern part of Vermillion lake, reports that Frank Porter, a half-breed, and Mrs. Dempsey of Stillwater, Minn., have for three months past been working among the Chippewa Indians on the reservation and have converted nearly all to Christianity. Thirty of them were a few days ago baptized by a Methodist minister at Tower.

The Indians a few days ago gathered all their idols in a big pile and burned them up.

LITERARY NOTES.

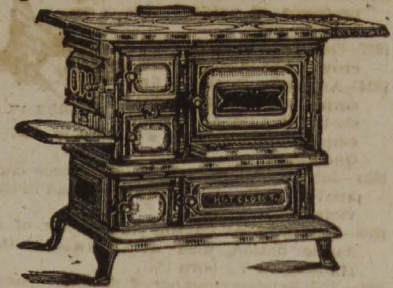

The August Magazine of American History is a rich midsummer number it opens with the first part of a delightful article on The Spartans of Paris, by General Meredith Read, K. G. C. R., brightened with graphic sketches of personal characteristics and illustrated with portraits of literary celebrities of France, whose works are familiar to every intelligent reader in America. An excellent picture of the great editor and author, M. Arsene Housaye, forms a welcome frontispiece to the number. The Fifteenth State, by John L. Heaton, gives information of exceptional interest in relation to the settlement of Kentucky, showing how the mountain barriers were passed and that a race course was established in 1775, so early that one man was shot by Indians while speeding his horse upon it. The Beginnings of the City of St. Joseph, by Judge William A. Wood, is a cleverly written account of the founding of the most beautiful of Missouri's cities, less than half a century ago. It contains an amusing picture of the first post-office there, in 1841, which was an old hat.

The fourth paper of the number, entitled The Right Reverend Samuel Provost, D.D., first Bishop of New York, by Rev. Isaac S. Hartley, D. D., is a very able and scholarly study, not only of the eminent subject, but of the exciting times in which he lived. A Character Sketch of Mr. Gladstone, by Hon. J. L. M. Curry, LL.D., will attract every reader. A paper follows on Governor Meriwether Lewis the heroic explorer of the western part of the continent, contributed by General Marcus J. Wright, of Washington. Other entertaining articles include the Bewitched Children of Salem, 1692, by Caroline E. Upham; The Royal Couple of Roumania; Archaeology in Missouri, by O. W. Collet; and The Four New York or Senior Regiments of Troops 1775. Every page of the August issue is readable as well as instructive. This is a live periodical, giving in each number something fresh and striking, touching fields of research not over trodden. Subscription price $5.00.

The failure of a young lady to enter Yale, after signally proving her intellectual capacity to cope with the most brilliant young men with whom she would come in contact, has called general attention to the essentially conservative character of our great educational institutions, where of all places we should find progress and liberality. As if in answer to the hostility of conservative thought to woman's progress in the intellectual or educational sphere. The Arena for August presents no less than eight leading papers from representative thinkers among women of America and Europe, discussing political, educational, social, sociological, economic and scientific themes, together with two literary papers, one by Miss Amelia B. Edwards, the famed Egyptologist and novelist, who in a most delightful paper reviews her own home life. An excellent portrait of Miss Edwards accompanies this paper. The other, a semi-historical story of Tennessee, entitled Old Hickory's Ball, by the charming young Southern author Miss Will Allen Dromgoole. The heavier essays by women are, The United Germany, by Mlle. Blaise de Bury, of Paris, one of the most brilliant essayists on the European continent. Where Shall Lasting Progress Begin? by Elizabeth Cady Stanton, one of the most thoughtful and sensible magazine essays of the month. A very fine portrait of Mrs. Stanton forms a frontispiece of this number. Individuality in Education, by Prof. Mary L. Dickinson; Psychic Experiences, by Sara A. Underwood, an extremely interesting contribution to the Arena's series of psychical papers. It is evidently the settled purpose of the management of the Arena to make that Review a busy man's library. The August Arena is brilliant and unique.

A good and timely table of contents, especially adaptable to midsummer reading, is presented by the NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE for August. Colonel Albert Clarke, the secretary of the Home Market Club of Boston, opens the number with a bright and instructive account of the State of Vermont, past and present giving pen pictures of all the leading men of the state. It is attractively illustrated and information is imparted in a light and easily digestible form. "A Side Issue of the Campaign" is a clever little story by Mary E. Brush, a name new in literature. It deals with the trials of a country editor and his wife, and shows a strong touch and tender sympathy for, and knowledge of the dreary life depicted. The Harvard essays are above the average contributions of such literature. Charles Lewis Slattery says something worth the saying in an original and piquant fashion in A Remedy for American Philistinism. The Birthplace of Hannibal Hamlin is a descriptive sketch of Paris, Me., especially interesting at this time, when the recent death of the old statesman is so fresh in the memory of the people. It is Charles E. Waterman, a fellow-townsmen of Hamlin's. William Howe Downes contributes a finely illustrated paper on the Literature of the White Mountains. W. Blackburn Harte chats pleasantly in a department called About Books, and several poems and sketches complete a very entertaining number.

TITUS & BUCKLEY'S
Complete House Furnishing Emporium.

What is an Emporium? What goes into its make up? Why the term? The term at once suggests something large. A business conducted on an extensive scale. A mart of trade where everything of a special branch or several branches of a particular line are gathered together under one head. Such a combination properly managed affords at once immense advantages over single department stores. Advantages in the way of trading with one salesman. Buying your goods at one place. Quicker service. Contracting a single bill in place of three or four. And lower prices. ALLWAYS from the fact that the items of expense in running such a store are made smaller in a dozen ways. Such is our Emporium, and its popularity is best attested by our constantly increasing trade. Remember that we have four floors fully stocked with GOODS THAT SELL.

Attention! Everybody!!

Do you love a cool and refreshing drink of Soda or Moxie? If you do, call for one of Stevens' Best. We can furnish you six days in the week, but on the seventh you will have to go dry. We have at our store all of the stations of both electric and horse cars running in and out of Peabody; but on the seventh day, or Sunday, you will be obliged to stand out of door in the heat or the rain as the case might be, as we have had a notice served on us by the so-called Law and Order League of Peabody, denying us the right to sell Soda, Confectionery, Cigars or Tobacco on that day. Therefore, we were obliged to close as we could not furnish, could not keep open.

GOD BLESS PEABODY!!

She needs it! 10,000 inhabitants and not a hotel or public house in the place! No inducements for strangers to visit us! No wonder our business is dull! No wonder our factories lay idle, our tanneries shut up and all business at a standstill! What we want is liberal sentiment and not littleness of mind! Then we shall grow and prosper as other Towns round about us.

Don't think we are losing courage at this state of affairs. We hope to see them righted and to live to see the good old Town once more redeemed and made prosperous as in the days gone by.

We have a large and fine stock of goods in our store, and we shall try to sell you as cheap as elsewhere. All fruits in their season. Choice Cigars, Confectionery, Tobacco and a thousand things too numerous to mention.

Will try to give you a lunch as well as we know how.

DO YOU LOVE YOUR CHILD?

Gracie Gilman lives in Dexter, Me., and she is the light of her little home. A short time ago she began to fail. The glow of health left her cheeks—they became colorless. She grew nervous. Could not sleep well. Would groan and cry out in her sleep for hours at a time. No appetite. The Death Angel drew near, but the Rescuer was at hand—DANA'S SARSAPARILLA gave her a good appetite; brought the roses back to her cheeks and gave her refreshing sleep and the father and mother are very grateful for it. Do you wonder at it?

Hearts are breaking with agony every day as the little arms clasp papa's and mama's for the last time.

Oh! Parents, banish disease, baffle death, by using the Great Remedy while you may.

At Hymen's Altar.

Miss Nellie J. Wallace of this town and John B. Tully of Dorchester were united in marriage at St. John's church, Wednesday, August 5 h, with a nuptial mass by Rev. M. J. Masterson. The bride was dressed in fawn colored Henrietta, the bridesmaid, Miss May Brennan of Groton, was dressed the same as the bride. The best man was Mr. Thomas Duffy of Dorchester. The ushers were Paul J. Spillane of Boston, G. Harry Russell of South Boston and Nicholas Wallace, a brother of the bride. Many beautiful presents were received including a silver service, able silver, pictures and bric-a-brac. After the marriage, a reception was given at her sister's, 5 Sawyer street. On their return from a wedding tour they will reside on Savin Hill Avenue, Dorchester, and will be happy to receive their friends after the first Tuesday in September.

Beware of Ointments for Catarrh that contain Mercury,

as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury and can be taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure he is sure to get the genuine. It is taken internally, and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co. Sold by all druggists, price 75c per bottle.

Ezra H. Shannon has on exhibition at his store a fatigue cap, knapsack, canteen, cross belt, and round-about which he says were used by the Danvers Light Infantry of 1775. The fatigue cap is an odd specimen, made upon a whalebone frame and shuts up similar to the modern crush hat. When open it presents the appearance of a melon set crosswise of the head. It is made of canvas with a stout leather vizer. He has also the gilt tomahawk that adorned the markee of the same company.

CHAPTER IV.
AN AMERICAN GIRL.

The figure of a woman coming slowly toward them.

In a small wooden shed in the Confederate lines, low down in the dip between Missionary Ridge and Lookout mountain, Joe Joliffe (or, as we may now call him, Viscount Doneraile) lay listening to the measured tramp of the two Confederate soldiers that were on guard outside, and watching through the chinks of the rough planking the going down of the last sun he was ever to see.

At dawn he must die; and the thought of that swift and sudden doom, falling upon him in the fullness of his life and vigor, sent a chill through his bold heart for the first time.

It was not that he feared death; he had faced it too often and longed for it too earnestly for that. But it was not that he had expected to die. He had hoped to fall in the front of battle, with the fierce, feverish joy of the combat pulsing hotly through his veins, and the shout of victory in his ear, and the old regimental colors waving above him. And now, instead of all this, he was to be shot down in cold blood as a detected spy!

And then there arose before him, as if in mockery, the glorious vision that had so often brightened his dreams at a time when all his waking moments were black with misery and despair. He seemed to see himself going back to claim before the world the noble birthright of which he had been wrongfully deprived, and the betrothed bride from which he had been cruelly parted. He saw her brightening his grim old feudal castle with the sunshine of her presence, and aiding him to relieve and elevate the oppressed tenantry whom his stern father had ground down into the very dust, and to make the name of "Irish landlord" a title of honor instead of a by-word and a curse. And now, in the place of all these golden dreams, there lay before him only a bloody death and a nameless grave.

It was true that one chance of life still remained to him could he but have brought himself to accept it. He knew—for he had been told so plainly enough—that if he would consent to be false to the flag under which he had fought, and aid in misleading and betraying the army to which he belonged, his life would be spared. Perhaps there might have been found some men, if men they can be called, base enough to accept mercy on such terms; but it was not so with Arthur Fortescue. The bitterest foe of his dreaded and hated race had never dared to hint that there had been among them at any time so vile a thing as a traitor, and their last descendant would have perished by the cruellest death that hatred could devise rather than even think of saving himself by such means.

The red glow of sunset was just dying away from the brow of the vast rocky wall of Lookout mountain and the glittering bayonets that crested it, when suddenly there was heard just outside the shed a hoarse challenge, and then a murmur of voices, among which the prisoner distinguished one that sounded strangely familiar to him. Then the door was unbarred, and in came a young man of his own age, in the uniform of a Confederate officer.

Years had passed since those two men last met, but they knew each other in a moment, and the brave young southerner, starting back, exclaimed in a tone of strong emotion:

"Good heavens! Art?"

"Hush, Percival," said the other, instinctively trying to lift his bound hands in warning. "That name must never be spoken again; I will die as I have lived—unknown."

For an instant the young officer eyed his friend in silence, biting his lips till they bled, and then he said despairingly:

"You know I would give my life for you any day, but even for your sake I must not forfeit my honor. You are my best friend, but still you belong to the enemies of our cause; I cannot let you escape!"

"I know you cannot, my dear boy," rejoined Arthur kindly, "and I should never think of asking you to do it, you may be sure of that. Now, if you have anything special to say to me I am at your service."

The words were spoken as calmly as if addressed to a neighbor at a dinner table, and indeed it was curious enough to see how, all through this strange conference, the man who was already in the grasp of death seemed perfectly cool and collected, while the man who was free and armed with all the power of command was completely unnerved by excitement.

"I can't say it," broke out the gallant lad, with a look of strong disgust on his handsome face. "It would be hard enough to give such a message to a stranger; to give it to you would choke me outright."

"I can guess it," said the viscount, smiling sternly; "you are sent to offer me life once more if I will turn traitor. I will spare you the shame of doing so, for you know what my answer will be, and what yours would be in my place."

"I do, indeed!" replied Percival emphatically; "but if there is anything whatever that I can do for you, short of betraying my trust by letting you go, I'll do it, come what may!"

"Nothing," said the other, "but let me write a letter, and have it sent to its address."

"I understand. Of course I have your word not to attempt an escape if I untie your hands?"

"You have," said the prisoner simply; and Percival, unbinding his arms, handed him a small pocketbook with a pencil in it and then stepped aside, leaving the doomed man to write his last words unwatched.

"They were soon written, and the young southerner, taking the note, bound the prisoner's arms once more, and then, looking for a moment at his old friend with a paler face than the brave man had ever worn amid the hottest fire of the Federal batteries, strode fiercely out of the shed without a word of farewell.

"Thank God!" muttered Fortescue, as the door closed behind him, "she will at least know that I was true to the last!"

But it seemed fated that Arthur's firmness should be tried to the utmost; for hardly had this agonizing scene ended when it was succeeded by another experience more trying still.

"The fellows say," remarked one of the two sentinels to his comrade, "that that's a gal somethin' 'round peddlin' fruit and white bread, with a nigger to help her. I wish she'd come down our way, for I feel as holler as a dead log!"

"You bet that's jest how I feel too," said the other; "and if she's got any whisky among her truck I reckon I'd give every cent I've got for a taste of it—and that ain't sayin' much, nuther."

The hungry soldiers appeared to have the luck of the hero of a fairy tale, for their wish was hardly spoken when they saw the figure of a woman coming slowly toward them through the fast falling shadows of night, carrying a small basket, while a negro bore a larger one behind her. They hailed her, and as she answered them Arthur Fortescue started at the sound of a voice which he had never expected to hear again.

It was indeed Constance Leigh herself, accompanied by the trusty colored scout who had brought the news of Arthur's capture. Her assumed character was undoubtedly the best that she could have chosen, for in this region, where war had done its worst, the spectacle of a young lady of good southern family driven to support herself by selling bread of her own baking and fruit of her own raising, was nothing uncommon, and the presence of the negro, presumably an old family retainer, still true to her altered fortunes, was quite in keeping with this idea.

Not without a long and weary search (being, of course, compelled to proceed with the utmost caution) had they discovered Arthur's prison, and even now their task seemed well nigh hopeless. The sturdy frames and resolute faces of his two guards showed that they would not be easily overcome either by force or cunning, and even if he could be freed his rescuers would still have to get him and themselves out of the camp undetected.

Constance proffered her basket to the two soldiers, who, saluting her with rough respect, began to help themselves with a will. But suddenly the elder of the two checked himself, and said in an insinuating tone:

"Say, miss, ye hain't got a drop o' whisky, I s'pose, in that ar biggest basket o' your'n? If ye hev, we'd be powerful glad of a sight of it, you bet."

"But is it not forbidden to sell liquor to the sentries?" asked Constance with well feigned reluctance. "That officer whom I met just now told me so, I'm sure."

"Wal, maybe it ain't right squar' with the orders," admitted the man unwillingly, "but jest fer once in a way it wouldn't matter much, I reckon."

Just then the negro attendant, attracting the attention of the two men by a very expressive pantomime behind Constance's back, displayed the neck of a bottle from a leather pouch at his side, winked knowingly at the soldiers, who winked at him in return. Then, turning sharply around, he contrived to upset his basket and uttered a loud cry of dismay.

"Oh, golly, missy, all dem tings done tumble out! You wait lilly bit, me pick 'em up 'gain!"

"Do you think I'm going to wait for you, you clumsy fellow?" replied Constance sharply. "Don't you see it's getting dark, and we must make haste home again? I'll go slowly on, and you pick up the things and come after me as quick as you can."

The moment her back was turned the negro handed the concealed bottle to the nearest soldier with a sly grin, hastily pouched his money, and bundling the scattered provisions recklessly into his basket, hurried after his young mistress. "That's derned good stuff," said the first soldier, taking a hearty pull, "though it has a queer sort o' taste, someways."

"That's so," assented the other, drinking in turn; "but I reckon good whisky's wuth hev'n, if that was pison in it."

There was something unusual in it beyond a doubt, for before long first one man and then the other began to grow drowsy and leaned heavily against the side of the shed, roused himself with a sudden start, and then let fall his rifle and sank to the ground in a dead sleep.

Up came gliding in a trice the dark figure of the negro scout, who had gone no farther than the nearest clump of bushes, and asked softly:

"You dere, Marse Joliffe?"

"Is that you, Zeke?" said the prisoner. "Dat me, sure 'nuff. You wait one minute. Me get you out."

Zeke soon found a spot close to the earth where the crazy planking, rotted by constant rain, was easy to cut through. Upon this he went to work, for the bar of the door defied his strength, one of the wary sentinels having jammed it by forcing a large stone into the socket.

The brave man hacked away as if working for his life, which indeed he was; for if fresh men came up to relieve guard while he was thus employed he would share the doom of the man whom he was striving to save. Again and again he thought he heard approaching steps, but happily it was only his fancy, and at length the moldering wood gave way. The young viscount crawled forth, and the lovers were instantly in each other's arms.

"Whether I live or die, darling, I've seen you again," said Arthur, kissing her, "and nothing can deprive me of that. Now, Zeke, what are we to do?"

"You put on dat uniform, Marse Joe," answered the negro, hastily stripping the unconscious man of his tattered gray uniforms, "and Missy put on dis yer 'un. Den you two take dem two rifles and march me off troo de camp; and if anybody ask whar you gwine tell 'em you done catch dis cussed nigger sell liquor to sentry, got order see him clar out ob de lines."

It was a bold and hazardous scheme, but there seemed to be no other way of escape. The shed served Constance as a dressing room and, being naturally tall, she made a very passable soldier, with the broad hat slouched well over her face. Zeke bundled the discarded clothing into his basket, and away they went.

Favored by the darkness, they got along more easily than they had expected. Twice they were stopped and questioned, but, having picked up the countersign, that and the excuse suggested by Zeke carried them through, and they were soon clear of the Confederate lines.

"Thank God," said Constance fervently, "we are safe at last."

But unhappily she was rejoicing too soon. Just then a storm of wind and rain burst upon them, making the night so dark that neither Arthur nor Zeke, though two of the best scouts in the Union army, could tell which way to turn, especially as they were now involved in a maze of thickets that would have been puzzling even in broad day light.

Happily a thick tree was at hand to offer them shelter, and Constance, wrapped in her companions' coats and the canvas cover of Zeke's basket, fell asleep from sheer exhaustion, while the young viscount, seated by her side, listened to her soft breathing and bled many a castle in the air for that future from which, only a few hours before, he had thought himself cut off forever.

Hour after hour went by in silence, but toward morning Arthur's quick ear caught a strange, dull sound far in the distance, growing gradually louder, and he guessed at once that some important movement was in progress. And so it proved, for day had hardly dawned when a roll of drums was heard to the northward, and Zeke, raising his head to listen, said:

"Marse Joe, you and missy better put on you own clothes 'gain and chuck dem soger tings away. Dem rebs no trouble us now, for dey soon hab something else to think ob, shuah, dan cotchin' we uns. Dat drum mean Marse Grant and Marse Sherman comin' out to whip 'em."

It soon appeared that he was right. While they were snatching a hasty meal from what was left of the contents of Zeke's basket, the rolling of the drums kept growing louder and nearer; and they had not gone far on their way toward the town, after changing their clothes again, as their guide had suggested, when the warlike concert was swelled by another sound—viz., a deepening roar of cannon that made the air tremble.

The great battle of Lookout mountain had begun.

It was not long before a sudden turn brought them full in view of the scene of action. Sherman's troops had already begun their attack upon Missionary Ridge, and a vast blue wave of assault was surging up against the steep face of the hill, while the morning sun broke in countless sparkles upon thousands of bayonets. All along the higher slopes the dark masses of the Confederates clustered like bees, and from the somber gray cloud broke ever and anon the flash and thunder of the death dealing cannon.

But grand as the sight was, the fugitives had no time to dwell upon it, for they were now well within the range of the Confederate guns. Shot and shell kept falling all around them, crashing through the bushes or tearing up the ground, and all three felt inwardly relieved when a few minutes later they found themselves in a deep, narrow lane between two high banks, which effectually shielded them from the flying balls.

Unhappily it was no protection against the shells, one of which suddenly fell within a few yards of them, and Arthur Fortescue had barely time to throw himself before his betrothed when the shell exploded, and they were both struck to the ground.

The girl was on her feet again in a moment, unhurt save a few slight bruises, but her lover lay motionless on the earth, with a thin stream of blood oozing through a wide rent in the breast of his coat.

CHAPTER V.
DEATH'S BRIDAL.

"Send for a clergyman and let us be married before I die."

"All up wid he, missy," said the brave negro, looking sadly down on the prostrate form of his old comrade. "Nebberdie Joe done gone dead at last!"

"He's not dead, and he shall not die!" cried Constance impetuously, as she threw herself on her knees beside the fallen man. "Yes, I can feel his heart beating. Help me to carry him to the town; we will save him yet!"

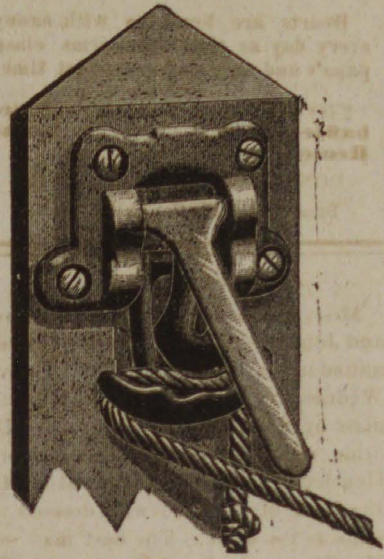

While she was speaking, she had torn off her scarf and used it to check the bleeding as well as she could. In doing so several pieces of broken glass and metal fell into her hands, and she recognized, with a smile of triumph even in that moment of agony, the fragments of her own miniature.

LAST WEEK the Cape Cod Item appeared in a new dress of type and column rules, which improved in its appearance very much.

THE DEATH of Judge Staples of the Superior Bench affords the opportunity for Gov. Russell to promote one of his staff to the vacancy.

SEVERAL of our exchanges have contained articles of alleged news regarding accidents to the Essex Road, lately, that are so much exaggerated as to indicate malice. Some of the alleged accidents never happened. Almost all are distorted.

DEMOCRATIC ORGANS are reporting defections in the Republican ranks in Ohio among the colored portion of the party. They represent that the colored voters have not received a sufficient share of party patronage.

The cause of the alleged defection indicates a Democratic instinct. We presume the voters referred to "got into the wrong pew."

THE RESIGNATION of Messrs. Cogswell, Rockwell and Walker from the State committee caused some pretty bitter feeling among members of the committee. It was charged that Mr. Walker personally sought the election, which gave a peculiar taint to his case. Messrs. Greenhalge, F. H. Wright and Gen. Draper have been elected to the vacancies.

A PRETTY general representation of the States and British Provinces, attended the recent National Education convention at St. Paul. The discussions and mental exchanges that occurred during the session will doubtless prove beneficial to all who were present as well as to the general cause of education.

The next convention will be held at San Diego, California unless the Executive Committee change their present opinions on the subject.

IT SEEMS now pretty certain that Lieutenant-Governor Haile cannot be counted upon as a candidate for Governor this fall. He has stated several times to his political friends that he would not accept even a unanimous nomination and he generally means what he says.

Mr. Crapo is not inclined to make a vigorous fight for the nomination and Speaker Barrett is voluntarily out of the field.

A strong feeling seems to be growing in the minds of Republicans all over the State, that Mr. Allen of Lowell is to be the nominee this fall, and so far as heard from his name appears to be favorably received.

IN DEFERENCE to the feelings of the white Southern Grand Army posts, Commander-in-Chief Veazey recommended at the convention this week that the colored posts be set off into separate jurisdiction.

The advice of the commander-in-chief as well as the petition of the white southern comrades has evoked a just condemnation from the press throughout the Northern states. It is to the credit of the organization that the scheme was rejected.

We predict the time will come when the promulgators of separation will be ashamed of their present course.

Musical Festival at Worcester

The thirty-fourth annual musical festival of the Worcester County Musical Association will be held in Worcester in September. Arrangements with some of the artists whom it is hoped may be engaged have not yet been completed. Regarding the chorus, the Worcester Spy of today, will say: "As regards the chorus, the foundation stone of the festival, never was it so well disciplined or prepared by selection and drill of the members for the arduous work before them, and never more full of enthusiasm." The orchestra will be selected from members of the Boston Symphony. A few more men will be engaged this year for special compositions, requiring a large variety of instruments.

The organist will be B. D. Allen, and the directorship will be held by Carl Zerrahn, assisted by Victor Herbert.

The music to be performed at the festival will be varied in programme, embracing the productions of Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Gluck, Wagner, St. Saens, Schumann, Burch, Rubenstein, Grieg, Weber, Tschakowsky, Verdi, Gounod, Berlioz, Lalo and others.

Tickets are to be sold September 8th, at auction.

ESSEX COUNTY.

Residents of Newburyport were startled early Tuesday morning by loud cries and howls that proceeded from the old vacant Cutter house, and thoughts of ghosts filled many a brain. It is thought a drunken tramp entered the house and spent the night. But he disappeared before the police were summoned.

Last Sunday as Mr. Pike of Salem was returning from Dungeness rock with his wife and two children and a lady friend, the horse suddenly stopped on a steep embankment near the old hermit's cabin. Mr. Pike urged the animal to proceed when suddenly he made a bolt over the embankment, taking the coupe and occupants with him. The carriage was wrecked and the adult occupants considerably injured though not very seriously. The children escaped unharmed.

Mrs. Samuel T. Poor and her daughter were burying in a piece of woods on their premises in Georgetown last week when a strange man about 30 years of age approached the daughter, who was separated by some trees from her mother and said: "Come here! I want you." Mrs. Poor stepped into view and the fellow said he thought she was his wife, and ran away. The frightened woman thought the man resembled the photograph of the missing F. C. Almy.

Louis Battime was knocked down on Chelsea street in Lynn on Friday night and robbed of his gold watch and $52 in cash.

Lynn's valuation is $32,493,272 in real estate and $44,764,672 in personal; number of polls, 4394. The tax rate is $14.60. The city's valuation in 1850 was $4,834,843; in 1870 it was $20,927,115; in 1880, $23,383,735; in 1890, $40,721,028, and in 1891, $44,764,672. James H. Winchell & Co.'s great shoe factory in Haverhill is to be closed and about 600 workmen thrown out of employment. Mr. Winchell announces as the cause that he is unwilling to submit longer to the tyranny of labor organizations. These organizations have given the firm considerable trouble, and the culmination has just been reached by an announcement that the lasters would demand an increase Sept. 1.

Mr. Arthur S. Temple, manager of the Salem Electric Light Company, has resigned to accept the position of manager of the Lamson store service. His headquarters will be in Boston. At a meeting of the electric light company held Saturday evening, Mr. S. Fred Smith, manager of the Salem telephone exchange, was elected to fill the vacancy. The successor to Mr. Smith has not been named. Mr. Temple has done good service in the position which he vacates and has given good satisfaction to the company. The same is true of Mr. Smith's relationship to the telephone service.

Secretary Abbot of the Salem Y. M. C. A. is passing his vacation on the shores of Moosehead lake.

Jeremiah Todd, Jr., 18 year old son of Jeremiah Todd, the Rowley grocer, was drowned in Paradise Creek on Monday, while bathing.

The tax rate of Georgetown this year will be $16.00.

John Lafferty of Bradford was arrested in Haverhill on Wednesday through a mistaken idea that that he was drunk. He proved to be insane.

Thomas T. Toomey of Salem was arraigned in that city Tuesday morning charged with throwing a lamp at his wife. Her testimony was to the effect that Toomey came home drunk and in a fit of anger because his supper was not hot, threw a lighted lamp at her. He was held in $500 for appearance before the superior court.

Allan W. Phillips, employed on St. Mary's church, Lynn fell from a staging to the floor, 25 feet below. He struck the hard oak back of a pew and beside receiving an ugly scalp wound was badly scratched about the face and legs. It is also feared he is injured internally. Mr. Phillips lives in Boston.

Haverhill had 17 deaths last week a majority being children.

There have been 2085 burials in Walnut Grove Cemetery, Danvers, since its consecration June 23, 1844.

A reception and testimonial will be tendered Bishop Brady at St. Joseph's Church, Amesbury, next Sunday afternoon.

An overflow of water in Music Hall building in Lynn on Sunday flooded a part of the post-office, which is located on the first floor. Several hundred letters were wet and 25,000 postal cards spoiled.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Cogswell of Newburyport enjoyed their golden wedding on Saturday. The original marriage ceremony was performed by Elder Henry Plummer at Haverhill, where the couple resided until 1867, when they removed to Newburyport.

Cleveland, Ohio, parties are inquiring for one David Lufkin of Ipswich, a shoe-maker who is supposed to be working at his trade in some Massachusetts shoe town. He has, it is said fallen heir to a large sum of money.

Mr. A. D. Story of Essex has laid the keel of a new schooner of 180 tons, old measurement, for Mr. George Dennis of Gloucester. He has also contracted to build a 300 ton schooner for Capt. Andrew McKenzie of Gloucester.

Mr. Waldo L. Hutchins of Salem has just received a new organ which he designed some time ago. It is made so as to give the greatest volume and purity of tone and yet be as compact as possible. The case is five feet long, three feet deep and about five feet high. The reeds are so nicely voiced that they produce tones which are very nearly equal in quality to those of the pipe organ. There are sixteen stops and double compress bellows.—Cape Ann Breeze

NOTED AND QUOTED.

Tinplate laborers may be brought into the United States.—Danvers Mirror.

But the importers may pay for it, if Secretary Foster has his way.

The women at Chataqua are planning a dress reform crusade. According to Miss Frances Willard the narrow waist of women is the death line. "I call it the death line," she said, "because this line has filled more graves than whiskey." Skirts, corsets and high-heeled boots are included in the tabooed list.

Commissioner Merrill's announcement that the endowment companies are about a million dollars short will not be pleasant reading for those interested in this class of speculation.—Ex.

This year has been a memorable one on account of the large number of drowning accidents which have occurred in this vicinity. Let us hope that the end has been reached.—Newburyport News.

When we read that there is a surplus of 400,000,000 gallons of whiskey in Kentucky we begin to understand why the Prohibitionists there have picked up their ears and plucked up their courage. Kentucky is lax in its habits when a surplus like that is allowed to accumulate.—Ex.

A four-leaf clover is considered a rare and extremely difficult leaf to find, although we have seen and heard of several. On Friday last Mrs. Michael Mann of this city picked a five-leaf clover near Wenham. Each leaf is as perfect as though it were only three. It was on exhibition at Mr. Mann's store Monday and among all those who viewed it none could say that they ever saw one.—Cape Ann Advertiser.

Cape Ann Breeze says the public would like to see the Peabody High School base ball game play in Gloucester again, but wish to be excused from Mr. Shea as umpire. It was his rulings at the recent game that calld down the maledictions of the crowd.

It is alleged that the last descendant of Joan of Arc, a commissary inspector in the French army, has just died. The last of illustrious lineage like the last survivors of the revolution and other wars are generally numerous.

The Southern wing of the Grand Army objects to recognizing colored comrades. Things have changed since '63.

Crossing the North river at New York in order to take a train at Jersey City will soon be a thing of the past. The great tunnel beneath the river is being rapidly approaching completion and it is expected it will soon be ready for use. The company even claim that in six months a single track through it will be in running order. The experience of passing through this subterranean passage way may not be very cheerful but the danger can not be any greater than at present.—Lowell Courier.

The New York City morning papers have been indicted for misdemeanor in publishing details of the recent executions at Sing Sing. With them a much greater misdemeanor would be to miss the news.—Lowell Courier.

About 19,000 children were given manual training in the public schools of New York last year.

Death of a Distinguished Colored Man.
George Williams a colored lawyer of Boston died at Park Hotel, Placemore, England, on Tuesday.

He had won considerable distinction in Great Britain, having visited the Upper Congo country and written letters to King Leopold of Belgium, severely criticizing the methods of officials of the Congo Free States and also Henry M. Stanley.

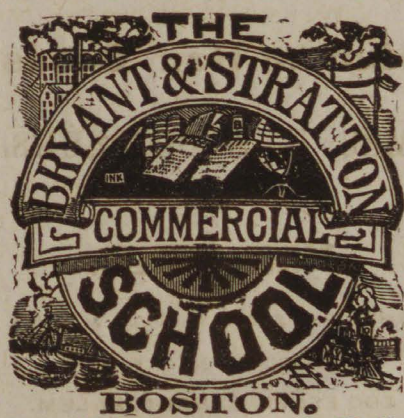

He was the author of a work entitled "The History of the colored Race in America" Was an attendant at the anti-slavery conference at Brussels, where he represented to King Leopold that he was the official representative of the United States, to the conference, which enabled him to obtain some much needed burs from some of the delegates.

He visited the Congo country under the commission of the Belgian government, and previous to his departure, became engaged to a white woman at Liverpool. She consulted Consul General New, in relation to the character and standing of Williams and learning from him how mixed marriages are regarded in America discontinued the engagement.

A Burglar Captured.

This morning about two o'clock, John Wood, the well-known plumber who resides on Main Street, was awakened by hearing glass break. On getting out of bed he received a blow on the head. He immediately grappled with the burglar, and after a terrible struggle succeeded in holding him until his wife obtained help. On being searched at the station, Mr. Wood's watch and wallet was found on his person. He gave the name of Robert Perry. He broken glass proved to be a bottle of Sulphur Bitters which had almost cured Mrs. Wood of rheumatism.—Exchange.

John J. Larkin was elected Mayor of Portsmouth Tuesday by the largest majority ever given a candidate in that city. The Democrats swept the city. Last year there were six Republicans to three Democrats in the city government. This year none.

Dyspepsia

Makes the lives of many people miserable, causing distress after eating, sour stomach, sick headache, heartburn, loss of appetite, a faint, "all gone" feeling, bad taste, coated tongue, and irregularity of the bowels. Dyspepsia does not get well of itself. It requires careful attention, and a remedy like Hood's Sarsaparilla, which acts gently, yet efficiently. It tones the stomach, regulates the digestion, creates a good appetite, banishes headache, and refreshes the mind.

Sick Headache. "I have been troubled with dyspepsia. I had but little appetite, and what I did eat distressed me, or did me little good. After eating I would have a faint or tired, all-gone feeling, as though I had not eaten anything. My trouble was aggravated by my business, painting. Last spring I took Hood's Sarsaparilla, which did me an immense amount of good. It gave me an appetite, and my food relished and satisfied the craving I had previously experienced." GEORGE A. PAGE, Watertown, Mass.

The President

Of the bank of Waverly, Iowa, says: Sulphur Bitters saved my life. For ten years I suffered from catarrh and liver complaint; I lost forty-five pounds and was growing worse rapidly. I lost all faith in medicine, but hearing your Bitters so well recommended, I gave them a trial. Six bottles cured me.—Smith P. Hunt, Waverly, Iowa.

Under the direction of Chief Burnham plans for two new buildings for the Exposition are being made. These buildings are for a shoe and leather exhibits, and for a musical display. They will be about 325 by 455 feet each, and each will cost $100,000. The location selected for them is in the grand court of the manufacturers and liberal arts buildings. It was the original intention to leave two great open courts in the center of the manufacture building each about 400 by 500 feet. After the shoe leather industries of the country made such a determined fight for the building and agreed to raise all the money necessary to put it up. Chief Burnham decided that the two buildings named could be erected in the courts which he had originally intended to decorate with flowers and fountains. The buildings will be one-story high and will be separated from the walls of the main building by streets fifty feet wide.

Jason Brown, aged 70 years, living near Akron, Ohio, was a visitor at Gen. Grant's tomb lately, that he might see where rests the body of the man who he said, ended the work his father, John Brown, virtually began at Harper's Ferry, and for which he was hung at Charlestown, West Virginia. On the occasion of the ride of Jason Brown on the elevated road to Grant's tomb, he was by accident an occupant of the same seat with John S. Wise of Virginia whose father Gov. Henry A. Wise signed the warrant for the execution of John Brown. The two sons were not acquainted with each other.

Bicycle statistics prove a constantly increasing demand for improved models and there is no doubt that the capacity of the existing varieties have been considerably overrated. Upgrades and gravel roads are still obstacles which the best inventive faculty failed to overcome, and every now and then the rivalry in the attempt of new feats leads to fatal results. A few weeks ago the champion bicyclist of northern Germany was astonishing the natives of Haderleben, in the province of Schleswig, but was in his turn surprised to find that a local youngster seemed able to imitate his most daring evolution.

Resolved to discourage the competition of amateurs, the professional then turned into a street with a steep down grade, and dashed along at a rate of speed which made it impossible to check himself in time, when he suddenly came across a flight of stones steps leading to the Unterstadt, or riverside suburb of the lit le town. For the first five or six steps the daring rider actually kept his seat, but in the next moment his machine jumped the track and dashed him down headlong against the stone balustrade of the steep terrace. The witnesses of the accident rushed for a doctor, but might have saved themselves the trouble. The champion's skull had been broken into splinters.—Philadelphia Times.

Opinions and Comments on Grover.

Mr. Cleveland is not going to take the stump in Ohio after all. Fortunately, however, the Republicans can easily win without his assistance.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Mr. Cleveland may have perfectly valid reasons for not going on the stump, but they will be accepted as the equivalent of abdication of the primacy in his party.—Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette.

Mr. Cleveland is making a very grave mistake, if he thinks he can refuse to come to Ohio this year and yet maintain his place as the foremost candidate for the Presidential nomination next year. The Ohio campaign is a pivotal one in many senses.—Cleveland Leader.

It is a matter of regret that President Cleveland is not going to take part in the Ohio contest. The Republican State committee will not easily be reconciled to this determination of Grover's. He would have proved "a tower of strength in the campaign."—Ohio State Journal.

Charles O'Connor Hennessy, city editor of the Evening News, in New York has been arraigned before Recorder Smyth, for misdemeanor, in having published the details of the recent electrical executions at Sing Sing. His counsel at once handed up a demurrer to the indictment, which was entered.

It is reported from San Francisco that large quantities of arms and ammunition have been shipped thence to the Chilian insurgents' concealed in bales of hay. The amount thus shipped is estimated at 300 stands of arms and 3,000,000 rounds of fixed ammunition.

It is said that the crop of premature or forced peaches throughout Hunterdon and Warren counties, New Jersey, will be "immense."

A CITY LUXURY.

Just as the city looks to the country for most of the luxuries used on its tables, so the country must turn to the city for those conveniences which are justly termed luxuries for the hard-working housewife. City housekeepers have learned to realize that to save time is to lengthen life.

SAPOLIO?

Is one of the best known city luxuries and each time a cake is used an hour is saved. On floors, tables and painted work it acts like a charm. For scouring pots, pans and metals it has no equal. IF YOUR STOREKEEPER DOES NOT KEEP IT YOU SHOULD INSIST UPON HIS DOING SO, as it always gives satisfaction and its immense sale all over the United States makes it an almost necessary article to any well-supplied store. Everything shines after its use, and even the children delight in using it in their attempts to help around the house.

A Reminiscence.
There are lullabies for babies and waltzes for young maidens, there are drinking songs for the wild oat sowers and love songs for them that love to tarry in the gloaming. But I heard Sunday the one piece of music that tuned upon the heartstrings of the married people.

Gilmore's band was playing "Reminiscences of Mendelssohn," and a thousand heads were wagging an accompaniment.

Suddenly, by way of finale, the "Wedding March" struck up. The effect was electrical. All over the audience the wedded pairs looked at each other and smiled tenderly. It was a reminiscence.
What happy visions it called up!

Here was a couple, homely, raw, from the country evidently, who had just started out to guide the plow together.
The march had been played for them in the little village church not long ago, but now they heard it played indeed.

They leaned a little closer together, and her big hand, fixed out to kill in cotton mits, which showed the wedding ring, sought his and held it.

And all through the audience I saw signs of the pictures called up by that fragrant and alluring bit of music. Old couples and young, rich and poor, those who live like cats and dogs together and those who have learned the pleasant alchemy of forbearance in wedded life, all were for the moment bewitched.

Ta, ta, tara-rara, tum tiddle de dum de di do. It fairly makes me reminiscent myself, though they played Wagner at my blessed wedding.—New York Herald.

Character in Eating.
There are few things by which character is more unmistakably portrayed than by a man's choice of food and the manner in which he devours it. In his preference for coarse or delicate edibles, or lack of preference for any—in the deliberate slowness or voracious quickness with which he consumes them—traits of character otherwise hidden are revealed. The dinners of a people are an infallible index of the national life.
It has been justly said that there is a whole geological cycle of progressive civilization between the clammy dough out of which a statuettes might be molded and the brittle films that melt upon the tongue like flakes of lukewarm snow.

In England one of the tests by which he various parties in the state church are unerringly distinguished is the test convivial. For example, it is said that some years ago a clergyman in that country went to a hotel to order a dinner for a number of clerical friends.
"May I ask, sir," said the waiter gravely, "whether the party is high church or low church?" "Now, what on earth," cried the clergyman, "do my friends' opinions matter to you?" "A great deal, sir," rejoined the waiter. "If high church, I must provide more wine; if low church, more wittles."—Professor William Matthews in Boston Traveler.

How Carl Schurz Learned English.
Few foreigners—indeed few English or Americans—speak and write the English language with the grace and purity of Carl Schurz, and he explains the fact as follows:

"When I first came to America I found that I knew as little practical English as the Yule or Harvard student who has read 'Faust' and 'Piccolomini' knows of German. I went to a bookstore and asked for the classic of the English language. The 'Vicar of Wakefield' was given me. I made a careful translation of the work into German, laid it aside for six weeks, retranslated it into English, critically compared the two versions, and knew the English language."— Youth's Companion.

Pin Superstition.
Superstition has special claims upon the pin; it should, we are told, "be lent, not given." There is a by no means small class of sensitive minded folks who regard the exchange of a pin a sure and sharp prick to friendship, and there is another goodly number that put themselves to all manner of inconvenience to steep and pick up every pin that lies in their pathway.—Table Talk.

STARTLING FACTS.
The American people are rapidly becoming a race of nervous wrecks, and the following suggests the best remedy:
Alphonso Hempling, of Butler, Pa., swears that when his son was speechless from St. Vitus dance Dr. Miles' great Restorative Nervine cured him. Mrs.
J. R. Miller, of Valparaiso, and J. D.
Taylor, of Logansport, Ind., each gained 20 pounds from taking it. Mrs. H. A.
Gardner, of Vistula, Ind., was cured of 40 to 50 convulsions a day, and much headache, dizziness, backache and nervous prostration by one bottle. Trial bottles and fine book of marvelous cures, and guarantees this unequalled remedy.

THE MONTE PINCIO CLOCK.

A Beautiful Piece of Work Run by Water Power and Requiring No Winding.
One of the attractions of the beautiful Monte Pincio gardens, at Rome, is a really unique clock, which is usually an object of interest to groups of passersby who stop

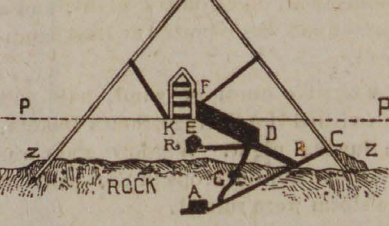

THE CLOCK ON MONTE PINCIO.

to minutely inspect it. A general view and description of this curious and artistic piece of mechanism is given, as follows, by The Horological Review.

The very charming case is composed of three branches in rustic work. It stands upon a square stone block, surrounded on its four sides by beautiful leaf plants, ivy and grasses. The stone foot stands within a water basin. The upper part of the case contains a dial covered with glass on each of its four sides. Upon the cupola stands a staff which carries the two bells for the full hour and quarters. At its upper end is a small vane in the shape of a battle ax.
The frame for the wheel and levers of the striking work, in which a small centrifugal pendulum takes the place of the fly, is close underneath the dial. At the back of the clock frame oscillates the second pendulum, and before this is located a mass of rustic work, similar to a large coral growth, from which issue small jets of water at regular intervals. Two of the uppermost coral branches are water conduits, pipes, from which empties alternately, at each swing of the pendulum, a small quantity of water into two leaflike spoons underneath, imparting to them an up and down motion. The peculiar motive power furnished by the water keeps the clock in motion, by a very remarkable escapement, so that it never requires winding. The construction of the clock is due to a monk, as is the case with so many old pieces of art work.

Theories of the Great Pyramid.
There has always been more or less mystery surrounding the origin and purpose of the pyramids of Egypt. Popular Science News says we may turn to certain facts which indicate that the builders of the pyramid of Cheops possessed a certain amount of astronomical knowledge. In the cut a vertical section of the pyramid in a north and south direction is given. From the entrance at C a passage leads to chamber (A) excavated in the rock underneath.
The sides of the pyramid exactly face the four cardinal points of the compass, and

VERTICAL SECTION OF THE GREAT PYRAMID.

An observer standing in the chamber A, about 3,500 B. C., and looking through the passage A C would see at the end the pole star, or rather the star Alpha Draconis, which was the pole star at that time, but which, owing to the precession of the equinoxes, has since been replaced by our present pole star, Alpha Urs Minoris.
The construction of this passage gives an approximate date for the erection of the pyramids which agrees with that established by the best authenticated traditions.

P P represents a supposed platform of observation; R, queen's chamber; K, king's chamber; G, natural grotto in the rock;
Z Z, accumulated debris; A, subterranean chamber; D E, grand gallery. Branching off from the descending passage C A is an ascending passage, B D, leading to the grand gallery, D E, which in turn leads to what is generally known as the king's chamber.

A new theory advanced by F. de Bal-lore in La Nature is that the pyramid was originally completed during the lifetime of the reigning monarch as far as the fiftieth course of stones, thus forming a platform of observation upon which astrologers could observe the movements of the heavenly bodies and cast the horoscopes demanded by the king. After his death the platform was completed into a pyramid, and the observatory of the monarch became his tomb and monument.

Two Novel Modifications of Sulphur.
According to Industries two novel modifications of sulphur have been recently discovered by Engel. The first, like that proved to exist in Wackenroder's solution, is soluble in water and very unstable.
The other is crystalline, soluble in carbon bisulphide and chloroform, and polymer-izes slowly in the cold and quickly at a temperature of 100 degs. C.; but, unlike the ordinary sulphur, which changes on keeping into the octahedral variety, it becomes converted into the white insoluble form which commonly constitutes so large a percentage of the material known as "flowers of sulphur."

Paper Horseshoes.
The composition of horseshoes of compressed paper, which have been introduced into the artillery and cavalry of the German army, is described by The English Mechanic. The shoe is made of sheets of paraffin paper cemented with a preparation of turpentine, Spanish white, lac and boiled linseed oil. The separate layers are stamped out, cemented and consolidated by a hydraulic press. When dry the shoe is rasped to fit.

Victims of Misplaced Confidence.

There is a famous dairy farm that supplies a large city not a thousand miles away from New York. The place was started some years ago by a wealthy gentleman of very high social and religious standing in the community which he aimed to supply. Of course, the farm was extensively advertised, and among the "best families" in that city a few years ago it was scarcely possible to find one which did not boast of having upon its table the eggs, butter and milk from this establishment.

In due course of time the venerable proprietor of this farm went the way of all humanity. When his executors came to settle the affairs of his estate one of the heaviest liabilities was a large account for milk that had been regularly furnished for a period of several years from one of the largest will milk concerns in the neighborhood. It is almost needless to say that the former patrons of this famous farm, when they learned of this little revelation, were less enthusiastic than they had been before. — New York Recorder.

A POTATO SORTER.

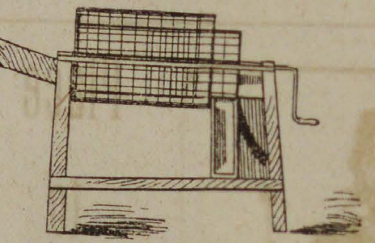

An Unpatented Potato Sorting Apparatus for Which Advantages Are Claimed.

A Massachusetts farmer writing to Rural New Yorker, gives the following illustrated directions for making a potato sorter:

HOMEMADE POTATO SORTER.

I would have two wire covered cylinders, one within the other. The inside one should be of a larger mesh so that nothing but earth and small potatoes could pass through, and the outside one of such mesh as to allow only the passage of the dirt. By the addition of another cylinder, another sorting of potatoes could be made. The inside cylinder should extend about four inches farther than the outside one, so as to make a more convenient fitting for the boxes through which the potatoes would slide. I think such an arrangement would be much better than other sorters I have seen illustrated. It would be better than the Hoover sorter, because the dirt would be separated from the small potatoes, and two sortings could be made, if needed. One advantage it would have over the Collins sorter, would be that there would be more certainty of separating the soil from the small tubers. I should suppose that in the Collins sorter, if the potatoes were thrown in too fast, the small ones would fall out beyond the lower screen and tumble to the ground.

SIDE VIEW OF POTATO SORTER.

In the device I have attempted to describe, an arrangement might be made whereby one end of the cylinder could be raised or lowered, making it more or less slanting. If the dirt clung to the potatoes, it would be rolled off if the cylinder were nearly level, and if it did not cling the potatoes would pass through much more quickly if the cylinder were quite slanting.

Importance of Young, Vigorous Queens.

It is very important that every colony in the apiary should have a young and vigorous queen at its head, for on the queen depends the best results in bee-keeping. I am not an advocate of killing queens at two years, or even three years of age, if they are doing good work. The bees will generally attend to the super-seding business; but they cannot always be depended upon. Therefore, a record of each queen should be kept on each hive, so that one can know the exact age of each queen, when examining the hives at any time.

If bees tolerate a slow laying queen, and are loath to supersede her, one has only to refer to his record for the why and wherefore. If such a colony is found, there should be no delay on the part of the apiarist in supplying a new queen. The simplest and most natural manner of changing the queen is to slip in a cell from one of the best colonies in the apiary twenty-five hours after the old queen has been taken away. If none but the best drones are allowed to fly during the mating season, all the young queens will meet with selected stock. This can be accomplished by the use of a trap having perforated metal large enough to pass a queen, yet small enough to exclude the drones.

It is important to introduce queens from a distance at least once a year. By breeding in new blood occasionally, the standard of the bees will be gradually raised, if the breeder of the queens has good stock, and is an experienced man in this particular branch of our industry. — American Bee Journal.

Turn Up the Soil.

Turn up the soil in the poultry yards and runs with either the spade or the plow. This operation should be faithfully performed at regular periods, after the fowls' excrements that accumulate where the birds are confined in small inclosures are removed, advises The Poultry World. Poultry will be much more thrifty when this plan is adopted, and the grounds can thus be kept more cleanly, while the process of turning the soil over affords the stock so confined a chance for fresh gravel and loam, as well as a temporary supply of worms, larvae, etc., that come to the surface through this means. In places where the fowls are limited to narrow quarters, or—as is often the case—to their houses only, the floors should be similarly treated frequently, and the benefits attainable will more than compensate the trouble occasioned by this process.

Nitrate of Soda on Wheat.

The wonderful properties of nitrate of soda are being strikingly exhibited at the Ohio agricultural experimenting station, where wheat is being grown continuously under different methods of fertilizing. Although the nitrate was not applied until the middle of April, it stimulated such a big growth that the plots which received nitrate in large quantities carried almost three as great a weight of vegetation as do the plots that had no nitrate.

POULTRY EXPERIENCE.

The Production of Finely Flavored Eggs and Early Market Chickens.

To have eggs of fine flavor the hens should be fed on clean food. Fowls fed on putrid meat, decayed or decaying animal substances, will lay eggs not fit to eat. Proof of how the food affects the egg may be had by feeding a number of hens on onions for a certain period. The eggs will become so strongly tainted with the onion flavor as to be unpalatable. Where the farmer allows his fowls unlimited range it may be said that it is impossible to control their feed, but under no circumstances should the fowls be allowed access to filthy substances. Even the practice of allowing the hens to scratch in the dunghills, as some of the old school of farmers think is necessary for the production of eggs, is not to be recommended. Where fowls are kept for the purpose of money making they will be found systematically arranged in certain numbers in pens and their actions under control. Good care, clean food and clean quarters will be found hand in hand. System and intelligence are as necessary in the management of poultry as in other lines of business.

When the productions of eggs with dark or brown colored shells is desired for a particular market, A. G. Gilbert, manager of the poultry department of the Ottawa experimental farm, and authority for the foregoing, says that either of the following breeds will be found to lay these: Cochins, Brahmas, Wyandottes, Plymouth Rocks or Langshans. Where eggs with white shells are wished they will be produced by Leghorns, Minorcas, Andalusians, Poles, Hamburgs, Games, Houdans or Dorkings. Where both are required Plymouth Rocks or Wyandottes, with the Leghorn or Minorcas, will be found to fill the demand most satisfactorily.

In regard to rapid flesh formers for early market Mr. Gilbert says: Experience with twelve of the leading varieties so far has proved that the Plymouth Rock is the most rapid flesh former, making a good market chicken between three and four months of age. All who try will find this result, provided the young bird is properly cared for and pushed from time of hatching. The Wyandotte matures rapidly, making a round, plump market chicken at from four to five months of age. Brahmas do not take on flesh quickly while growing, but after seven or eight months make a fine, large bird. Either of the first two named will be found to make early chickens for market.

An Opinion About Cider Making.
An Ohio correspondent, writing in The World, expresses the following opinions about cider making:

"The sooner you get the cider out of the cheese the better. The oldtime idea among farmers was that the cheese should stand over night before pressing, but they have learned better." To the idea conveyed above I desire to express my dissent. As boy and man I have helped to make a great deal of cider in my time, and have had the acquaintance of many farmers in a district producing a great deal of cider, with opportunities for knowing their opinions and practices as to the immediate pressing of the pomace or otherwise. It certainly was the "oldtime idea" to let the newly ground pomace remain in the receiving box for from ten to fifteen hours before pressing out the juice, unless there were special reasons for hurrying, and I have yet to learn that farmers who make cider in this section have changed their opinions on the subject.

The liquid when first squeezed out of the fruit is simply apple juice, not cider, to which it is shortly afterward changed by exposure to the atmosphere. This change, in my opinion, best begun by keeping the juice and the pomace together, as before said, for some hours before separating them, and for the reason that while in that condition the juice acquires from the crushed pulp of the fruit a body and flavor superior to that of freshly pressed juice. It is quite generally admitted that cider made from apples ground in small hand mills is inferior to that made in the larger rural horse power mills, and I believe the reason is that in the case of the former the juice is generally pressed out immediately, as fast as the apples are ground. As in the making of many varieties of wine by fermenting the juice and the pomace together for a few days an infusion is derived which serves to give it a desirable special character, so I believe apple juice by a few hours' contact with the pulp of the fruit, while exposed to the atmosphere, will make better cider as a result of the process.

Feeding Troughs for Poultry.

A Michigan correspondent suggests in The Philadelphia Farm Journal an improvement in feeding troughs for poultry, a drawing of which is here given.

IMPROVED FEEDING TROUGH.

Cut a slot in each end board of the trough and let into these slots a half-inch board. Sharpen the upper edge so fowls won't roost on it. The board should come down low enough so that fowls cannot get under it, and the trough should be so narrow that they cannot get in it with their feet.

Farm Items.

The late Colonel Curtis expressed the opinion that a silo can be built for $150 which will hold 125 tons. To go a great deal in debt will not pay, but a farmer who wants to make butter the year round can well afford to have a cheap silo.

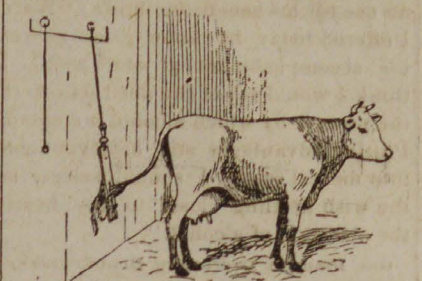

A Missouri farmer rates an acre of corn fodder as equal in value to three-quarters of an acre of timothy.

It is claimed that the residuum left in soda fountains will cure chicken cholera. Put it in the watering troughs and feed a small quantity to the fowls in dough. Langshans of both sexes often retain white nest feathers until almost fully grown.

DEVICES FOR MILKERS.

Plans for Controlling a Cow's Tail and Restraining a Kicking Cow.

The air is swarming with flies bringing a return of the vexations with which milkers are all so familiar. The plan shown in the first cut, says Rural New Yorker, does not mean that one has to hitch the cow to the tail to hold her while he milks. The device is designed to be used in the stables to keep the cow's tail out of the pail and out of the milker's face, which is usually the second place she wishes to put it. It is made of a small piece of hickory with a long, deep notch sawed in one end. A clinched nail or screw keeps it from splitting further. The long hair or brush of the tail is slipped between the prongs, and the ring is slipped over the ends, thus securely fastening it. The ring is fastened to some part of the stick with a string long enough to permit its being put in place readily. Strapped to the upper end of the stick is a snap into which is slipped another ring at the end of a small rope attached to the wall behind the cow.

When the milking is finished, with one hand slip the lower ring off the prongs and the whole will drop back against the side of the stable, and the tail be free. Small ropes, with rings at the end, are fastened along the back of the stable midway between two cows, one answering for both. The fastener is unsnapped and moved from ring to ring as needed. This is valuable not only as an aid in fly time, but as a cause of additional cleanliness, which at some seasons is the greater benefit.

A New York farmer writing to Country Gentleman, says:

I have read and heard a great deal about restraining a cow from kicking, and have tried all the methods at different times and failed, until I hit upon the following, which I think will commend itself at a glance (see second cut). Take a rope 10 or 12 feet long, fasten it securely about 5 feet 3 inches from the stanchion and 21 inches from the floor, as shown at A. After fastening the cow to the stanchion, take the free end of the rope, pass it between her hind legs, draw it up in front of her right leg, and passing it around behind her, draw it over a hook or (better) a flange pulley, as shown at B. Have a loop in the free end of the rope, draw and fasten it by running a pin through the loop. To release the cow all you have to do is to draw the pin and throw the rope off the hook or pulley, B. It is impossible for the cow to kick or move about or injure herself in the least. I have cured the worst kind of kickers with this appliance in a short time.

Hog Cholera.

We find the following in a bulletin from the Georgia department of agriculture:

Hogs fed freely on turnips, cabbages, sweet potatoes or chufas will rarely if ever have cholera.

Sleeping in lousy or dusty beds kills as many or more hogs than cholera.

Plenty of pure water, frequent change of food and clean stalls will contribute greatly to the health and thrift of all farm stock.

Do Bees Injure Fruit?

In reply to the query, Do bees injure fruit? it is safe to say no. They will not disturb sound fruit, the outer skin or covering of which is whole. Horticulturists have made complaint that bees injure fruit, and especially grapes, but these complaints, when culminating in a lawsuit, have been, so far as we have heard, settled in favor of the beekeeper.

Here and There.

In Europe wherever the sugar beet is grown the value of the land has increased. Beets are grown for two or three successive years on the same land, which will then produce better cereals and other farm products.

The quarantine against American cattle in England is said to be only nominal.

The Florida Dispatch says: "Every farmer who is troubled by moles ought to try a few castor bean plants. We knew an old gardener who was noted for raising vegetables, who always had a few dozen of these plants scattered about his garden for the purpose of keeping away moles."

The Canada thistle has spread so rapidly in New Zealand that a law is about to be passed similar to the Canadian law, compelling farmers to destroy the weed on the roadside adjoining their lands as well as upon their lands.

The National Stockman tells that an effectual way to keep crows from pulling corn is to catch one in the cornfield in a steel trap. The bird's screams will call the crows together from miles around and gives them a scare of that special locality.

Speed the planter, the harrow, the roller and the corn plow. The finely pulverized earth retains greatly more moisture than hard and unstirred ground and it holds all the rain that falls.

Half cured hay is wholly spoiled by rain, and about half spoiled by a heavy dew, if suffered to receive it when spread upon the ground.

AN EVENTFUL DAY FOR A BABY.

How Little Estelle Amused Herself and What Happened to Her.

The following letter, which we find in Little Men and Women, was written to a little girl called Lady Gay by the papa of a very tiny friend of hers named Estelle:

DEAR LADY GAY—I must tell you about our baby's mishap. I know you will be sorry she had it. You see, they have so much whooping cough around here that our little girl has no one to play with, so she has to amuse herself. On that day she had called in vain at the fence for May, the next door neighbor, and had done all a baby knows how to do, in the house and out of doors.

She had spent two hours washing her dollies. She washed their faces, and their hands, and their feet, taking pains with their ears. She had chatted with the birds on the cherry trees and with the chickens in their coops; with the cats, and even scolded the spotted cow. Then she played company was coming, and in getting ready for her visitors she had her mishap. There stood by the gate, where the spotted cow drinks, a large tub of water half full. Estelle had found a chip on the ground and was playing it was a hair brush, and she went to this tub to wet it. After doing this a dozen times she leaned too far over into the tub, and on the thirteenth time her feet slipped and in she went, head first.

How she managed to keep her head above water I do not know, but she did and so was not drowned. But she was badly frightened when her grandma took her out; she cried for two hours and was sick all night and the next day. Whenever we mention the word "tub" to her, Estelle now spreads her two precious hands before her eyes, and turns away her face, as if to say, "If you please, I would rather not think about that."

Estelle would send her love if she were not fast asleep. Her mamma and I send a good deal, and we are, dear Lady Gay, your loving friends. Goodbye. ESTELLE'S PAPA.

The Spelling Match.

They'd all sit down but Bess and me, I surely thought I'd win. To lose on such an easy word, It was a shame and sin. We spelled the longest in the book. The hardest ones—right through, "Xylography," and "pachyderm," And "gnosis," and "phthisic," too.

I spelled "immalleability," "Pneumonia"—it was fun! "Phlebotomy," and "zoophyte." Each long and curious one. Then teacher gave a right one smile. When Bess spelled "aquarella," And backward, quick, she turned the leaves, And then she gave out "spell."

I'm sure I never stopped to think About that "double L." It seemed like such an easy word; But one can never tell. "S-p-a-l-l," I spelled it. And how they all did laugh! And teacher said, "I think, my dear, Too easy 'twas by half."

Now, Bessie was not proud nor mean: She said, "No wonder, Jane. For we were thinking of big words; You'll spell it right again." I'm glad that it was Bess who won, And not those others. Well! If I did miss one little word, I showed that I could spell.

Edible Birds' Nests.

Edible birds' nests, of which we have all heard, form an important article of commerce between the islands of the Eastern archipelago and China, where they are considered to be quite a luxury. They are the nests of a species of swallows, not unlike the bird with which we are familiar at home; it is about four inches and a half in length, with a great expanse of wing. The nest, which is small, is found in vast numbers in the great rocky caves which abound in some of these eastern islands; they are formed of a gelatinous substance, nearly transparent, and now believed to be a species of seaweed. The nests, which are so numerous as to be adhering to one another, are collected by means of ladders and ropes; it is after the young are fledged that the nests are thus taken. In the Chinese market they are sold at such a high price that they can only be purchased by wealthy persons. They are used to thicken rich soups, and are considered to be a very nutritious food. Each nest weighs about half an ounce.

"For God is my King of old, working salvation in the midst of the earth."—Ps. 74: 12. "Thus saith the Lord, 'Is my hand shortened at all, that it cannot redeem? Or have no power to deliver?'—Isa. 50: 2.

He Would Destroy Alcohol.

Dr. T. Gaillard Thomas, who, with Drs. Emmet and Sims, makes the brilliant trio of specialists which has well nigh wrought miracles in the field of surgery for women, will, by this utterance in a recent address, make friends with a host of women who have no use for his beneficent knife: "Were I offered today by some great power the accomplishment of one wish, I think I would select the destruction of the process by which alcohol is created. Putting advantages and disadvantages into mental scales, I should select, as the wish nestling closest to my heart, the abolition of alcohol."

One Plan for Decreasing Drunkenness.

A western man has a scheme for decreasing drunkenness. He would establish a state infirmary and compel those who make and sell liquor to pay for its maintenance. He would tax the distiller $1,000, the wholesaler $500, and the retailer $100 a year in its behalf. Then he would treat drunkenness as insanity, and confine all drunkards in the asylum until they are permanently cured.

One of Thousands of Warnings.

Two negroes met in a saloon. They quarreled. They walked out on the pavement. They continued their dispute. One stabbed the other in the back of the neck. If they had not inflamed their passions by drink they would not have quarreled, nor would the one be lying now at the point of death and the other sitting behind the bars awaiting his trial.—Progressive Age.

"Teetotalism is Bread and Butter."

A gentleman was once speaking at a children's meeting. Suddenly he asked, "What is teetotalism?" and waited for an answer. Presently one little fellow held up his hand, and the gentleman said, "Well my boy, what is teetotalism?" And the boy answered, "Please, sir, teetotalism is bread and butter."

Then all the children present laughed right out at such a reply, and the speaker smilingly said, "What do you mean by calling teetotalism bread and butter?"

The little fellow replied, "When father is a teetotaler I get bread and butter before I go to school, when he is not, I have to go without my breakfast."

"Leave Off Before You Begin."

Archdeacon Farrar, in one of his temperance addresses, remarks: "Cruikshank, the artist, offered £100 for proof of a violent crime committed by a total abstainer, and the money remains unclaimed to this day. I offer as much for proof of any one case—either in the church or out of it—where drunkenness has been cured without total abstinence. The only safe way of drinking, as an Irishman put it, is to 'leave off before you begin.'"

A Significant Record.

The drunk and disorderly persons arrested in London in twelve months exceeded 15,000. At 110 inquests during that period excessive drinking was the verdict. No fewer than 271 infants were overlain.

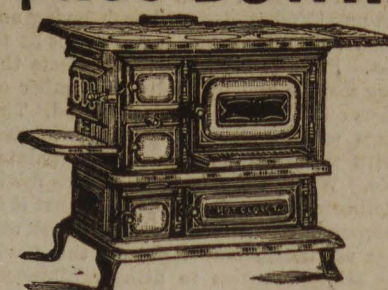

F. C. BURNAND.

We to-day present to our readers an extremely funny man, F. C. Burnand, the editor of the London "Punch." The position became vacant in 1880 through the death of Tom Taylor and Mr. Burnand was immediately chosen by his colleagues as their chief. Whoever is familiar with the popular periodical can judge of the ability of Mr. Burnand as a humorous writer. His popular name is "the funny man of England." The editor is the author of "Mokeanna," "Happy Thoughts," "The Burlesque Novels," "The Bompje Papers," "How, When and Where," and a legion of other equally witty stories.

TITUS & BUCKLEY'S
Complete House Furnishing Emporium.

What is an Emporium? What goes into its make up? Why the term? The term at once suggests something large. A business conducted on an extensive scale. A mart of trade where everything of a special branch or several branches of a particular line are gathered together under one head. Such a combination properly managed affords at once immense advantages over single department stores. Advantages in the way of trading with one salesman. Buying your goods at one place. Quicker service. Contracting a single bill in place of three or four. And lower prices. ALWAYS from the fact that the items of expense in running such a store are made smaller in a dozen ways. Such is our Emporium, and its popularity is best attested by our constantly increasing trade. Remember that we have four floors fully stocked with GOODS THAT SELL.

Attention! Everybody!!

Do you love a cool and refreshing drink of Soda or Moxie? If you do, call for one of Stevens' Best. We can furnish you six days in the week, but on the seventh you will have to go dry. We have at our store all of the stations of both electric and horse cars running in and out of Peabody; but on the seventh day, or Sunday, you will be obliged to stand out of door in the heat or the rain as the case might be, as we have had a notice served on us by the so-called Law and Order League of Peabody, denying us the right to sell Soda, Confectionery, Cigars or Tobacco on that day. Therefore, we were obliged to close as we could not furnish, could not keep open.

GOD BLESS PEABODY!!

She needs it! 10,000 inhabitants and not a hotel or public house in the place! No inducements for strangers to visit us! No wonder our business is dull! No wonder our factories lay idle, our tanneries shut up and all business at a standstill! What we want is liberal sentiment and not littleness of mind! Then we shall grow and prosper as other Towns round about us.

Don't think we are losing courage at this state of affairs. We hope to see them righted and to live to see the good old Town once more redeemed and made prosperous as in the days gone by.

We have a large and fine stock of goods in our store, and we shall try to sell you as cheap as elsewhere. All fruits in their season. Choice Cigars, Confectionery, Tobacco and a thousand things too numerous to mention.

Will try to give you a lunch as well as we know how. Polite clerks always in attendance.

A Big Blaze on Caller Street.

Aulsen & Mohan's Factory in Ashes. Losses Reach $17,000.

On Tuesday morning about 2 o'clock an alarm of fire was sounded from box 23 followed directly by a general alarm in consequence of a fire at Aulsen & Mohan's morocco factory at the end of Caller Place, and directly behind the large Jacobs' factory occupied by P. Lennox & Co. Before the alarm had ceased, the flames had gained such headway that the whole heavens were aglow. The locality of the fire has always been considered by underwriters a dangerous place—a regular tinder box. Buildings are packed into the adjacent area without any regard to safety, and the wonder is the whole block has not been swept away ere this. Several fires have occurred in the same block, which, through the vigilance of a well organized fire department have been confined to the buildings in which they originated, and in some instances, without even the loss of one entire building. To the eastward is the Harris tannery and currying shop of C. P. Osborn, and a little farther on, the morocco factories of Annable Bros., and W. P. Clark; to the southward is the immense Lennox factory and quite a block of dwellings; to the westward is Smiley's livery beside another block of houses and in the direction of Caller street stand numerous tenement houses and the shop formerly occupied by John Boyle and another morocco factory, while toward the railroad is the Duck Island settlement and Mr. Harris' barn. Every building of the entire block is of wood. The origin of the fire is thought to have been in the locality of the buffing wheel in Aulsen & Mohan's factory as several insipient blazes have been quenched there before. No engine or boiler is located in the building, the power used by the firm being furnished by means of a shafting supported by a long truss, propelled by the engine in the Harris tannery.

Once the fire was started it spread with great rapidity, and when the department arrived it was well under way, the entire building being enveloped in roaring flame that sent up great clouds of thick black smoke. Chief Littlefield was prompt to arrive and ordered a line of hose laid to protect the adjoining buildings. The hose was promptly laid, but when the attempt was made to open the gate of the hydrant on Caller street, it was found impossible to obtain sufficient force to make that line of hose available, as the gate had probably become corroded and refused to be opened. As soon as the trouble was discovered, new lines of hose were ordered to be laid from Main street, but meanwhile the fire was making frightful headway, and spread to Calvin P. Osborn's shop, and even the Lennox factory commenced to smoke from the intensity of the heat. After some delay a torrent of water was thrown upon the burning structure, and the flames soon began to subside; but before the fire was fully under control, the morocco factory where it started was ruined and a tenement house alongside badly damaged.

An immense crowd of curious spectators gathered about the streets and alleys, and the scene was further animated by men, women and children who had beaten a hasty retreat from the surrounding houses, most of the children having left without the ceremony of dressing.

The insurance was placed through the agencies of O. B. Chadwick & Co., and Albert H. Merrill.

The loss on stock has been adjusted and paid to the full amount of the policies $700. There was also an insurance of $2000 on machinery.

Mr. Holman's insurance was $2000, on the factory building and $900 on the dwelling house. Mr. Holman requests us to extend his thanks to the Department for their efficient services in saving his property.

OBITUARY.

W. C. Munroe Passes Away Suddenly at his Summer Cottage.

William C. Munroe, senior member of the firm of Munroe & Arnold of this town, died suddenly about six o'clock Monday morning at his cottage at Juniper Point, after a very brief illness. Mr. Munroe was taken ill Friday afternoon and left the office to go to his seaside residence. His condition became worse after reaching home and the family began to entertain fears of his recovery. On Sunday afternoon, Drs. George S. Osborne of this town and Arthur Kemble of Salem, performed an operation which it was hoped might relieve his sufferings, but no appreciable benefit was experienced. Everything was done that medical skill could devise to alleviate his condition until the last. The immediate cause of death was a stoppage, superinduced by a rupture produced several years ago, which was aggravated by the strain caused by handling a spirited horse at the Willows last Thursday while engaged in hauling some rocks. Every time the horse approached the water he became frightened and it required a considerable effort on the part of Mr. Munroe to handle the animal.

The deceased was a native of Salem, being born in that city on the 21st of December, 1833. Sometime before the war he purchased of S. F. Reed the Boston express business which he conducted alone for a while and then formed a partnership with his brother-in-law, John Grout, and continued the business under the style of Grout & Munroe for about six years, when in 1866, the interest of his brother-in-law was purchased by Mr. Frank T. Arnold and the firm name was changed to Munroe & Arnold. Mr. Arnold managing the business in Boston, while Mr. Munroe attended to the Peabody department. Under the latter combination a large and thriving business was built up, which while it amounted to a monopoly, has always given the town a competent, first-class freight and parcel express service.

The deceased was widely known as a horse fancier, and an excellent judge of horse flesh. He always owned one or more fine driving horses, and has until recently been a part owner in the famous Maine stallion Nelson. The horses used in the freight and express business have always been a subject of favorable comment by strangers, not only for their good care but their intelligent selection as well.

Deceased took a great interest in the fire department of the town and was a member of Steamer Company No. 2 for several years.

He always had kindly regard for the welfare of his employees and the most cordial relations always existed between him and them, to whom as well as the public his death will be an object of unfeigned regret.

Beware of Ointments for Catarrh that contain Mercury,

as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury and can be taken internally, and acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure he is sure to get the genuine. It is taken internally, and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co. Sold by all druggists, price 75c per bottle.

He leaves a widow and two children, a son and daughter, to mourn his sad death. His son is well known to the business people of town having been engaged in the Peabody office of the firm for several years.

The funeral took place on Wednesday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock from his summer residence at Juniper Point. The services were conducted by Rev. A. F. Welch of the Universalist church who pronounced a splendid eulogy upon the deceased. Floral tributes were profuse and elaborate. Four elegant bunches of roses were laid upon the casket after it was placed in the brick receptacle and fifteen floral pieces upon the grave. Hundreds of people have visited the Monumental cemetery since the interment to view the floral designs which cover a large part of the lot.

Essex Agricultural Fair.

The Essex Agricultural Society have issued their annual catalogue giving details of the seventy-first annual fair, to be held at Lawrence, on Tuesday and Wednesday, September 22 and 23.

The free show of stock and implements will be in pens and tents on South Union street. The drawing and ploughing matches upon adjacent grounds, and the horticultural, vegetable, floral, art, dairy and kitchen display will be at the City Hall. To the latter an admission fee of 20 cents will be charged as usual.

At 1 o'clock on the 22d, a trial of draft horses and cattle will be held on Salem street. Wednesday at 10 o'clock ploughing matches will be held on South Broadway. At 11:30 the annual address before the society will be delivered in Trinity church, by William E. Moody, Esq., followed by the annual dinner at Porter's hall.

The usual rules will be observed as to entry of exhibits and awards of premiums. Full information on this subject can be had by addressing John M. Danforth, Esq., Sec'y of the society, at Lynnfield Centre.

A branch which deserves special mention, is the list of special premiums offered by Mr. H. M. Whitney of Lawrence which are as follows: For the best loaf of bread, $15.00; for one pound of the best butter, $10.00; for one dozen of fresh hen's eggs, greatest weight, $5.00. The prizes to be in money or values not less than the above amount. The bread, butter and eggs to be presented to the city hospital at Lawrence. Committee—Gilbert E. Hood, Lawrence; Elbridge Mansfield, Peabody; Mrs. Fred E. Clark, Lawrence; Mrs. Geo. L. Averill, North Andover. For white bread, premiums, $3, 2 and 1. For bread made of Graham flour, premiums, $2 and 1. For bread made from other grains, or other grains mixed with wheat, premiums, $1.50 and $1.

A Royal House-Warming.

A reception to the city and suburban press was given Wednesday afternoon from 4 to 6 o'clock by Messrs. Charles A. & F. H. Burdett at their elegant new college building at the corner of Washington and Kneeland streets, Boston. The two members of the firm were found in their stately private office, extending a welcome to their characteristically courteous manner, and eight or ten of the regular corps of teachers assisted in the reception, ushering the visitors through the spacious apartments of the college, invariably terminating the rounds of the building in the improvised dining room, where a choice collation was partaken, while an orchestra filled the air with sweet strains.

The Burdett Business College is not a new institution as most of our readers probably know. The senior member of the firm commenced his business career in Salem, whence he removed to Boston, in 1879, opening a school at 169 Tremont street, and immediately attracted notice by the high standard of his work, especially in the line of penmanship in which department of art he easily led all competitors in this country.

As his business increased he found it necessary to add a new department to his school and in 1881 his brother, F. H. Burdett became associated with him, taking entire charge of the business branches while he still perfected the rising generation in commercial and artistic penmanship.

The business grew rapidly, and several removals were rendered necessary to furnish room for the increasing classes, and additional teachers were employed to assist the work of business training. The last removal was like the others, rendered necessary to accommodate constantly increasing applications for admission to the college, which has won a wide reputation for thoroughness and competency of teaching, through the success, largely of the graduates, who have been able to fill with credit, many responsible positions in large mercantile establishments, by reason of the careful training received at this institution.

The present quarters, which will be open for tuition on the first of September, cover a floor area of one-third of an acre, divided into a number of rooms devoted to the various grades and branches taught, which includes book-keeping, banking, typewriting, shorthand, mathematics, commercial law, and, in fact, everything necessary to fit one for managing the affairs of business.

Five hundred scholars can be accommodated at one time and it is expected to carry over seven hundred on the register this winter.

In the work of remodeling the building for College purposes considerations of cost have given place to the accomplishment of elegance, health and convenience. This is the only business college in the city that is fitted with an elevator and regarding light and ventilation the abundance of windows and height of rooms renders the appointment perfect.

The Burdett National Bank, one of the departments of the institution is an elegant conception of architecture and presents a striking aspect of realism. The minutest details of banking are represented, and when the school is working one would be unable to tell the difference between this training bank and one where current money takes the place of Burdett greenbacks.

LOVE IN A BARREL

By HOWARD PYLE.

CHAPTER I.

A long row of some dozen or so great stone mills, with roofs tall and steep, or hipped and gabled, and with walls whitened with flour, gaped by open sheds and half doors upon a sunny stretch of dusty road, they stood upon the steep, bluff shore of a river. Upon the river they are two stories high; upon the road front they are four, five, or even six. In some seasons sloop, brig and barks are lashed to the river walls loading with barrels of flour or cornmeal, the shouts of the stevedores and the creaking of blocks and tackles echoing from stony wall to stony wall. On the decks lounge a few idle sailors in baggy breeches or petticoats, club queues down their backs and cocked hats or Monterey caps upon their heads; and upon the road in front of the mill doors stand clustered the queer old vehicles of the day—farmers' carts, coopers' carts, great Conestoga wagons dragged by teams of eight, ten or twelve mules, and which travel some-times even as far as Pittsburg.

Upon the farther side of the road from the mills is the millrace, brimming with the speeding waters that in the night time fill the silence with the brawling of their hurrying rush. Here and there side streams shoot under the bridges and lift floodgates and set the huge, groaning wheels a-turning, and the rude machinery and great millstones to jarring and turning in answer.

Such, one hundred years ago, were the famous old Brandywine flour mills, which ground more meal during the Revolution and for the old West India trade than was ground at any other place in the country.

CHAPTER II.

"Uncle," she said in a breathless whisper, "will he die?"

It was on the evening of the twelfth of September, in the year seventeen hundred and seventy-seven. The yellow sunlight streamed in through the windows, and all the room was full of the good smell of supper. The blue china cups and saucers and plates and dishes, the pewter spoons, and the iron knives and two-pronged forks, polished till they shone like silver, caught the light and winked and sparkled and twinkled back again at the broad yellow patches of light on the floor.

Friend Sparks and his family sat at supper, but though the smell of it was so good the knives and forks and spoons clattered in a listless fashion, and the family ate and drank without much heart in the matter.

"I don't know," said Friend Joseph, laying down his knife and fork and looking around at his daughters, and more especially at his niece, Mattie Dixon—"I don't know what it is that sets you girls so agog over a laced hat and epaulets and a blue coat and brass buttons. Here was General Washington and his army not more than a month in town, and now, because he has gone and takes away with him his snipe jack-aids-de-camp and captains and majors, all the women in Wilmington and Brandywine are in the vapors."

Now men are not quick at seeing things, but the women knew very well why Mattie Dixon's eyes were red. Indeed, a gloom had fallen upon them all ever since a young farmer had ridden down from Chadd's Ford that morning, bringing the news of a great battle that had been fought up the Brandywine. Later in the day two farmers' wagons had passed through the village, bringing each a load of wounded men lying in the straw.

But Friend Joseph Sparks did not notice Mattie's red eyes.

"I do not," said he presently, separating the don't in his emphasis—"I do not see what it is about a shedder of blood that turns a woman's head. I, for one, should be sorry to see a daughter or a niece of mine tied to such an unregenerate, soulless son of Anak as one of those young men who make bloodshed a trade, and think that a blue coat and brass buttons excuse murder. Now there was a battle fought yesterday," he continued, leaning back in his chair and folding his hands, "and no doubt a many likely young men killed or maimed for life. There was that Philip Van Cleif who came here so often when"—The worthy Friend was suddenly interrupted in his monologue by Mattie Dixon rising so precipitately as to knock her chair over backward with a loud clatter upon the floor, and then hurrying from the room without a word, feeling in her pocket for her handkerchief as she went.

Friend Sparks stared after her with open eyes. A momentary pause followed as the door banged behind the girl. "How could thou talk so, Joseph?" said the good mother presently. "Didn't thou see that it was as much as she could do to contain her spirits?" Then she, too, pushed back her chair and followed her niece.

"Botheration!" said Friend Sparks, and then he also pushed back his chair with a loud scrape upon the floor, and taking his pipe from the mantel shelf, filled it with tobacco and lit it with a coal he chose very carefully from the embers on the hearth.

His three daughters, Rebecca, Mary

Jane and Susan, said nothing, but as he went out of the door in a swirling cloud of tobacco smoke they exchanged very meaning glances.

Friend Joseph Sparks was one right well known in the milling circles of his day; a wealthy man as times went, a keen bargainer, but as honest as the palm of your hand. He was the owner of three of the largest of the Brandywine mills, and sat in the gallery, as it was called, in Friends' meeting; for, like all of the Brandywine millers, he was a Quaker.

He was a man perhaps too keen and caustic in his speech, but with a good sound heart buried in the prickly husk. He alone of all those Quaker millers dared to grind flour during the dark days of Valley Forge. Now he leaned over the front gate of the garden feeling very uncomfortable at the thought of having made Mattie cry, looking absently up the road and puffing curling wreaths of smoke into the breathless air.

The sun had set and the glimmering gray of twilight had fallen. A cart came slowly moving down the white stretch of road—a farm cart from up in the country. A board was laid across it, and on the board sat two men—one a farmer, the other an officer in the Continental army.

Friend Sparks watched them with a sort of dull curiosity. So many of the broken army had passed by ones and twos through the village that day that the sharp edge of interest was worn off. But as the cart came up to him it stopped. "Do you know any one living here by name Joseph Sparks?" said the officer.

"I am Joseph Sparks," answered the miller, opening his gate and coming out. "Who has thee there in the cart, friend?" looking into the straw.

"A friend of yours," said the officer, "who was hurt yesterday in the battle." As he spoke the figure raised itself from the straw where it lay, and turned toward the miller a face white as death, the head and jaws bound around with a bloody cloth, and a pair of eyes dull and languid.

The good Quaker hardly recognized in the pale, woebegone figure the gay young Major Van Cleif, who had visited at the house so frequently during the last month.

He stood staring, agape, holding his pipe idly in his hand. "Is thee much hurt?" said he at last.

"I don't know," said the young man faintly. "Can't you lodge him somewhere till he gets some doctoring?" asked the officer.

Friend Sparks stood for a moment sunk in troubled thought. "Nay," said he at last, "I can't bring him into the house. If the British should come, as it's likely they will, it would bring trouble that I have no right to shoulder. I can lodge him at the mill, and will make him as comfortable as I can." And so it was arranged.

Friend Joseph followed the cart down the short hill to the mill door, and there saw the wounded man carried into the loft, where a bed of empty bags was made upon a pile of wheat. Then leaving the mill foreman to watch the patient, he went back to the house for his coat and hat.

The news of the coming of the wounded man had already flown through the house. Mattie met him at the door, and as he stood in the dark entry, gripped him by the wrist with both hands. "Uncle," she said in a breathless whisper, "uncle, will he die?"

"I don't know," said Friend Sparks in an answering whisper; "no, I think not." He could just see her pale face in the gathering darkness.

"Oh, uncle!" she said, in the same gasping whisper. "He asked me to marry him before he went away. If he dies my heart will break." And she began to cry convulsively.

Friend Sparks stood quite still for awhile. "I am going for Doctor Shallcross," said he at last, and then Mattie let go his wrist and he left her, shutting the sitting room door softly behind him. "After all, it is no such great matter," said the doctor, as he and Friend Sparks walked across the road from the mill to the house in the starry darkness. "It is a sword stroke upon the side of the head, but the brain is not injured. He is only faint from loss of blood. I sewed up the cut, and I'll come again to see him tomorrow morning. I wonder," he added, "that they should have sent him here to Wilmington instead of taking him to Philadelphia along with them."

"Never mind," said Friend Sparks. "He is here now, and I'll make him as comfortable as I can."

Mattie Dixon awakened at early dawn the next morning with the dripping of the rain falling upon the roof—pat! pat! and an unusual sound of men's voices out in the road before the house—loud talking and laughter. She jumped out of bed and ran to the window, and saw upon the other side of the road a sight that made her heart stand still.

A row of stacked muskets stood under the trees among the yellow leaves. Accoutrements, haversacks and cartridge boxes hung from the crossed bayonets, and squatting, lolling and sitting upon the ground were some two score of soldiers in tall grenadier hats, with white leggings upon their legs, and the blaze of red coats shining from under the cloaks hung loosely across their shoulders. Three or four officers sat upon a bench between two of the maple trees, and the white smoke from a fire rose sluggishly up through the half naked branches.

The British had come. Without waiting an instant Mattie slipped on a petticoat over her nightgown, and in her bare feet ran down stairs and burst into her uncle's room. "Uncle!" she cried, "the British have come!"

Joseph Sparks sat up in bed as though moved by a spring. "Oh!" cried the girl, wringing her hands, "the soldiers will find him and kill him or send him to the hulks."

"Botheration!" said Friend Sparks, "thou thinks of nothing but the young man. Go and get dressed. Thou's a spectacle."

"If he was only a barrel of flour," said friend Joseph, as the family sat at a melancholy breakfast that morning. "I'd get him away as easy as goose grease." And then again they all sat silent in thought.

"Uncle," said Mattie suddenly, "does thee remember those double barrels that thee had made to send cornmeal to Jamaica in the Nancy schooner before the war? Could a man get into one of them?"

"Perhaps so," said the miller, "if—He stopped suddenly and pushed back his chair. "Why, thou's hit it, girl," he cried. "We might barrel him up and send him off—eh, mother? Why, one of those West Indian double barrels would be the very thing."

"We might send him to sister Jane, in Chester," said Rebecca Sparks, looking at her husband.

"No, no; that would never do," said the miller. "No man could be cramped in a barrel five or six hours. Remember, too, that he's wounded. I tell thee what we can do. We can send him to Cousin Jane Penny; that's only four miles. We might say that we were sending a barrel to Chester, and they would never know that it stopped on the way—tschkl!" said he suddenly. "Here we are in a rut: who's to take the barrel?"

It was a point that they had not thought of.

"Can't John Binney take him?" said Rebecca. John Binney was the mill foreman.

"I don't see how he could," said Friend Sparks. "they would know that John Binney would never go to Chester with a barrel of flour. If the boys were only home" (by the boys he meant the two sons, Reuben and John). "they might do it."

In the pause that followed Mattie suddenly arose and went to her uncle and knelt beside his chair. "Uncle," said she in a low voice. "What is it, Mattie?"

"One day when aunt and thee were away from home I put on the clothes that Reuben wore when he was a boy." She bowed her head, and a long pause of silence followed. The old clock in the corner said sharply, "tick, tack." At last Friend Sparks broke the silence, and he spoke in a voice more gentle than his usual acrid tone. "Thou may put them on again, Mattie," said he.

CHAPTER III.

"Because I am a poor girl and am trying to save my dear friend."

Colonel Gorse had made the counting room of the great north mill his headquarters. He was lighting his pipe at a candle when the glass door opened and Friend Joseph Sparks came in, his beaver upon his head, a corporal escorting him, holding the sleeve of the Friend's coat between his thumb and finger.

He had come, the Friend said, to ask for a permit to pass a barrel of flour through the lines.

"Take off your hat," said Colonel Gorse.

"Nay," said the Friend, "it is against my conscience to take off my hat to any man."

"Damn your conscience!" said the colonel. "Take off your hat!"

"Nay," said the Friend. "I cannot take off my hat."

The orderly, who stood near to the colonel, leaned over and said something to him.

"I don't care a damn who he is," said the colonel in reply to the whispered word. "He sha'n't wear his hat before me. Take off his hat, corporal."

The Friend made no objections as the corporal lifted off his hat and tossed it upon the bench beside the door. "Now then," said the colonel, "tell me your business."

The opening did not seem very propitious, but Friend Sparks began his story again. He had a sister in Chester to whom he had promised a barrel of flour. It should have gone yesterday, but he had put off sending. His sister would be looking for it, and he was sorry that she should not get it. Would the colonel let him send it through the lines by his hired boy that morning?

"Can't your sister buy flour, instead of sending to Brandywine for it?"

"Why, thou sees, friend," said the miller, "money has been very scarce with us of late. My sister's husband is on a voyage to the West Indies, and she looks to me to help her in these matters, so, if thou'll let me, I'll send that barrel of flour this morning."

Once more the orderly whispered in the colonel's ear. Perhaps he told the chief officer that Joseph Sparks was one of the richest men in that part of the country. The two held a muttered talk for a few minutes, and then the colonel turned abruptly to the Friend with more respect in his voice than he had shown before.

"What time did you want to send that flour?" said he.

"About nine o'clock," said Friend Joseph.

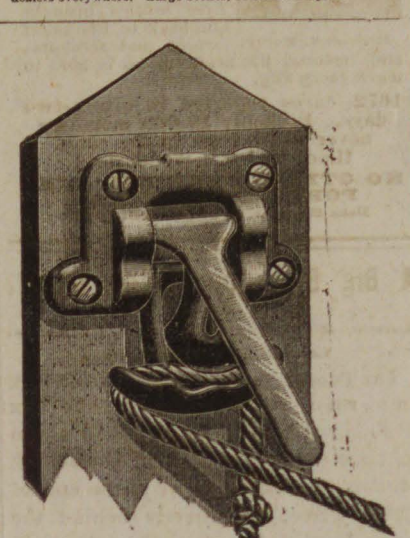

"Well," said the colonel, "have it ready by nine o'clock and I will let it go through the lines."

So at nine o'clock a cart half full of straw stood in front of the door at the south mill, with a pretty, pale faced boy standing at the horse's head. The miller and his foreman lowered a great double barrel by a block and tackle from the loft above. Two or three soldiers were standing in the rain with their cloaks over their shoulders, idly watching the

IN THE Beverly Times of Wednesday, is a communication from the Directors of the Essex Electric Street Railway, in answer to a communication of the week previous, which charged the absence of band concerts at the Willows to the door of the Essex management, and suggested that if the petition were now pending, for a franchise it would be likely to be dismissed.

The communication points out the real reason for the failure of music, one for which the company is in no ways responsible.

NEXT TUESDAY afternoon the second town meeting to vote upon the question of establishing a municipal electric light plant will be held at town hall. Like the first, printed ballots will be used, but an additional question will have to be settled in another way, that of appointing a committee to carry out the wishes of the town in case the statute is adopted, which seems to be taken as a foregone conclusion.

One member of the original committee which was proceeding to contract for a plant when stopped by the mandate of the Court, has since passed away, and if, as probable, it is deemed advisable to reappoint the old committee it will be necessary to make a new appointment to fill the vacancy referred to.

IN SPEAKING of the gubernatorial question, the Milford Journal says:

"There will be no contest of any nature for the head of the ticket, in the approaching Republican state convention—not so much as a ripple. Mr. Crapo will be nominated by acclamation, for no candidate will appear against him. Mr. Allen of Lowell will not be a candidate against Mr. Crapo, believing that entire unity of action should characterize the selection of a candidate."

It may be true that Mr. Allen, deeming that party interest requires, unity of action will refuse to contest the nomination with Mr. Crapo; but it must be remembered that the Republican party of Massachusetts is not made up entirely of dough faces and putty men, who have not sufficient mind to realize that they have rights that cannot be alienated without their consent by any clique of political wire pullers or office seekers. Massachusetts Republicans demonstrated last fall that they were no puppets, to be danced when the self-constituted party leaders pulled the string, and it behooves all fair-minded, unselfish Republicans to see that no man is foisted upon the party, who will compel thinking men either to vote the other ticket, or what is almost equivalent, not vote at all.

It is the selfish maneuvering of the kind of party leaders alluded to that threatens the future of the Republican party and makes independent voters of men who would otherwise adhere to party lines.

While we deplore the disruption of the party by that or any other means, we feel that cold facts cannot be ignored, and hence must enter our protest against any movement tending to force upon the party any nomination that lacks the element of spontaneity.

Mr. Crapo is known to the older Republicans as a clean man, worthy to fill the highest post of honor within the gift of the Commonwealth, but past experience has demonstrated his unpopularity among a certain, large element of the party, and his nomination as a result of such barter or anything bearing that flavor seems destined to nothing but inglorious defeat.

Joined in Sacred Matrimony.

At 2 o'clock Thursday afternoon, Rev. George A. Hall of South Congregational church, performed a wedding ceremony at the residence of George F. Osborne, Esq., on Park street, uniting in the holy bonds, Miss Louise Endicott Osborne, his older daughter, to Mr. Francis William Morandi of Malden.

The wedding guests consisted only of the immediate relatives of the contracting parties.

Following the marriage ceremony, a reception was tendered to about forty intimate friends of the parties. A light lunch was partaken and the happy pair entered a carriage and were driven to their future abode, No. 189 Clifton street, Malden, where they receive their friends after September 15. As the bridal party rolled away toward their new home, the customary shower of rice and a superannuated shoe were thrown after them.

The Melrose society dedicated the new tabernacle on Tuesday evening, Rev. C. E. Davis performing the service, assisted by several other pastors. It is 51x26 feet and contains beside a church auditorium eleven commodious dormitories. President James F. Almy of Salem has been in attendance during the week.

C. W. Mason, United States engineer, has arrived in Lynn for the purpose of finishing the Lynn harbor basin, for which the Government has appropriated $15,000. The basin will be 600 feet long by 300 feet wide, with a depth of ten feet at mean low tide, and will be about 600 feet from Holder & Breed's wharf. The work will be done in six weeks.

The selectmen of Danvers offer rewards of $250 each for the detection of the person or persons who set fire to the Peabody barn and the tool house in the Walnut Grove Cemetery, making upwards of $1000 already offered for the detection of incendiaries.

The Directors of the Beverly & Danvers Storage Battery Road held a meeting on Wednesday morning, but adjourned until Friday without transacting any business. It is understood that a proposition was received from the Union Electric Car Company of Boston, offering to sell them the cars, engine and balance of their present outfit; also one from the Essex Electric Road of Salem, offering to equip the road with horses and cars. The storage battery cars have not been in use for nearly three weeks, and residents along the line will welcome any kind of conveyance that will bring them into closer relations with the centre.

Our High School

Work upon the High School extension is progressing rapidly and there seems to be no doubt the building will be ready at the time stipulated in the contract, the 29th of this month.

On the first floor are located, at the rear of the building, four recitation or class rooms two each, being 21x37 feet and two 18x31 feet, these rooms lying to the south are supplied with abundance of sunlight. On the front of the same floor, to the left hand of the main entrance is a large room designed to be used as a girl's dressing room, while on the right is a commodious lavatory for the boys, and to the rear of each room, transept corridors connect the main corridor with the side doors, and from each, rise flights of stairs leading to the second floor, the rear or southerly portion of which is the school room, an immense chamber, 64x44 feet, in which will be about 120 desks. This room is designed to accommodate 145 scholars if necessary. At the northerly extremity of the room is the dais where the principal's desk will rest, and above this four speaking tubes provided with electric buttons will put the principal in communication with the four class rooms below. In the front portion of the building on this floor are three small rooms one designed as a private room for the principal, another for the boys' dressing room and the third is a lavatory for the use of the girls.

The steam heating apparatus is being installed by George H. Little.

Great care has been used in the appliances for ventilation, and all the sanitary arrangements are first class.

The interior finish is of hard pine throughout.

The outside of the building is being treated to a second coat of paint of a drab tint. When completed the job will be very satisfactory and a credit to the committee who have it in charge.

DANA'S SARSAPARILLA is guaranteed to absolutely cure disease, and it does it too.

Surrendered to the Naumkeag.

At a meeting of the Marblehead Selectmen Tuesday afternoon, it was voted to allow the Naumkeag company to string wires in town as far as Selman street. Consideration of further extensions of lines has been postponed by the board.

The vote stood 4 to 1. It is a complete and unconditional surrender to the railroad company, no conditions as to fares or anything else outside of ordinary conditions affecting public use of the highway, being interposed.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

Monday will be the grand opening night at the Globe Theatre. The attraction will be John T. K. Ledy and Lederers' comic players in the laughable farce comedy "U and I." The play has been renovated and will be produced with new songs and medleys said to be more catchy than ever before.

"The Midnight Alarm" at the Grand Opera House closes to-night, and on Monday Miss Agnes Herndon will appear in her great play "La Belle Marie." The New York Herald speaks thus of the play: "Miss Herndon, one of the most attractive, dashing and beautiful women on the American stage, is attracting large audiences at the Fourteenth Street Theatre in the comedy drama 'La Belle Marie.' The story is that of an innocent, blushing girl, who, thrown off by her lover, assumes the role of an avenging nemesis in the shape of a French woman, and lures her betrayer to destruction—justice, as she righteously terms it. The play holds the attention of the audience to the end and gives the opportunity to Miss Herndon to exhibit her great dramatic talent. Miss Herndon, as Jean Ingleside, the trusting young girl with blond locks, is charmingly simple and girlish, and as the laughing, mocking, beautiful, scornful, bewitching, dashing 'La Belle Marie' in raven tresses and a French dialect, she is simply superb. There was no gesture, pose or movement made which had not a meaning and a corresponding force. She was all grace, and every turn of her magnificent figure was intended to convey a thought. She was thoroughly artistic in this regard, so much so that the auditor was lost in amazement at the subtlety, finesse and delicacy of all she did. Her impersonation is dainty and strongly amusing, and real to shuddering at times. The play is novel, refreshing and enjoyable. We predict a great success for Miss Herndon and 'La Belle Marie.' The usual matinee performances will be given.

Evangeline is occupying Boston Theatre stage at present. Two matinees are given weekly in addition to the evening performances.

Niobe will be brought to a close after nine week's success at the Museum to-night and Monday, Mr. Roland Reed in a new comedy, The Club Friend will occupy the attention of the audience.

Will Re-open Tuesday, Sept. 1st.

Wm. Webber & Co.

We have finished our semi-annual account of stock and find the past season to be the most prosperous in our business career. Our sales are away in excess of any previous season, and as a matter of course our profits show a corresponding increase. Our wonderful and unparalleled success is entirely due to the fact that we conduct business on strict business principles, giving everybody the best value they can obtain for their money, treating every one with uniform courtesy and politeness and cheerfully exchanging goods or refunding money where perfect satisfaction is not given. As a natural consequence we are always busy and we never know what a really dull season is. The only trouble most people experience who visit us is to get waited upon; this will be obviated the coming season by an increased number of attendants in nearly every department of our establishment.

Now to show our appreciation of the liberal patronage extended to us, we have determined to give our customers a benefit commencing Friday, (Bargain Day) and with that object in view we shall make final and sweeping reductions throughout every department on all three floors, to close the season previous to receiving our new Fall and Winter importations.

The great final closing sale will commence Saturday, August 15th, and continue for 10 days, and will afford our customers and the public

OBITUARY.

Wm. H. Little.

On Sunday morning, William Henry Little passed away at the old homestead on Main street at the age of eighty-two years and nearly eleven months. He was born in the same mansion where he died, September 19, 1808, and for many years was engaged in the leather business, succeeding his father, William Little. The deceased was a man of more than ordinary intellectual powers and had a marked taste for general mechanics, which has been of great service to him in his career, and which on several occasions he has used to the advantage of his native town while acting as a public servant. He also had a peculiar aptitude for mathematics, and in his later years has derived much amusement in the solution of intricate problems of higher mathematics such as the average mind is wont to look upon as beyond the scope of ordinary comprehension. His manner was genial, always having a sunny smile and pleasant word flavored with a serene dignity, for all with whom he came in contact. To his disposition as well as his superior abilities are attributable the influence he has always exercised in public affairs.

For more than thirty years the deceased was a valued member of the fire department and after the abolition of the old fire wards, held the position of Chief Engineer for several years.
He has served on numerous important committees of the town and in 1862 was elected as Republican representatives of the town in the General Court where he proved a valuable and efficient servant of the town and was re-elected in 1863. He also served for six years on the Board of Trustees of Peabody Institute, and when the building was remodeled, served upon the committee which has that work in charge. In the Water Department too his services were of great value to the town, by reason of his faithful attention to the duties therein imposed and his appreciation of the details of the business and of the machinery employed in that department. For eleven years he was President of the Salem and So. Danvers Oil Company which position he resigned a few months since.

Deceased was a conscientious, lifelong member of the Unitarian society, and took a lively interest in all works of charity or benevolence. He leaves two children, Miss Addie A., and Mr.
George H. Little.

His son has for several years conducted the machine business on Forster street, which at one time formed a branch of the establishment conducted by deceased.

The funeral took place from his late residence, on Tuesday afternoon and was largely attended. Many old residents and business acquaintances were present to witness the last rites.
The funeral address of the presiding clergyman, Rev. J. W. Hudson, as a fitting tribute to the character of the deceased. Floral contributions were quite numerous. One from the Veteran Fireman's Association, of which deceased was an honorary member was very handsome design in which were wrought the initials of the organization.

The remains were taken to Monumental Cemetery.

A lawn party was held at the residence of Charles H. Tigh on Chestnut street Thursday evening. Music was furnished by the Eighth Regiment Orchestra.

Co-Operative Building.

The success of the Co-operative bank in helping poor people to own houses has led to the organization of an institution upon a similar plan, called the Order of the Mayflower.

The plan of the new organization, is to require members to pay in a sum, equal, at least, to four dollars per month, which is credited to the account of the members, and any time after ninety days, if the member wishes to buy or build a house, and has paid into the treasury a sum equal to ten per cent of the estimated value of such house, the Order buys or builds the desired house and permits the members to occupy the same, when the previous monthly payments cease, and a sum is paid in lieu thereof, amounting to three-fourths of one per cent of the total cost. This payment, which amounts to about the same as the member would pay as rent for a house of similar value is applied to the payment of the principal sum, and in a little over eleven years the house is paid for and a deed is given the member.

If, on the other hand, a member concludes not to continue in the Order after the expiration of ninety days, he can withdraw all that has been paid in, except membership fees. In this institution the features of interest is is ignored altogether, neither being paid nor charged.

Ample security for the money paid in is provided for and in some respects the institution is preferable to the cooperative bank. Its especial advantage however, lies in the fact that it operates all over the country and thus covers a great many small places, where it would be unprofitable to establish a bank.

In place of the mortgage given to the bank, this company passes a lease similar to those of the installment companies engaged in sale of personal property, but with the important qualification, that there is no absolute forfeiture. If payments cannot be met, the member receives an equitable proportion of the money paid in; or he can procure a loan of the company to cover temporary shortages.

The company will, of course, have another advantage incident to cooperation: that of buying material at lowest rates.

The order is almost brand new, but it is attracting a great deal of attention and many members are already enrolled.

Edward G. Meserve, the secretary,

Almy Captured!

THE MURDERER SECURED.

FOUND IN WARDEN'S BARN.

FRANK C. ALMY PLEADS

"NOT GUILTY."

Frank C. Almy, the murderer of Christie Warden, has been captured at last, in the immediate locality of the tragedy which was committed July 17th.

Mrs. Warden, the mother of the victim, had occasion to visit the rear of one of the large barns connected with the homestead of the sorrow stricken family, in search of some missing chickens, and removing a covering, noticed an opening in the underpinning of the barn, where, thinking the chickens might be secreted, peered in, and discovered a jelly tumbler, and upon reaching in and overhauling the debris, numerous canners were found that had lately contained various kinds of edibles. Suspicion was naturally aroused by the remarkable find, and the sheriff was notified, and the clue followed up, which led to the belief that the assassin was still lurking about the premises. At different times since the murder, inhabitants of the village have missed preserves and other articles of food, and an examination of the cans by some of the parties whose cellars have been raided resulted in identifying most of the cans found under the barn. A watch was set. Prof. H. C. Wither of the state agricultural college and Mr. H. C. Brown concealed themselves Wednesday night in a cornfield, to note proceedings. Sometime after midnight a man appeared, approaching the lonely watchers, who was at first thought to be Mr. Warden, but upon closer inspection proved to be Almy.

He walked up to the apple trees and began helping himself to the fruit eating ravenously and taking away a store for future use, in a bag. Unconscious of the presence of his watchers.
He returned to a large barn, which is connected with several smaller ones, and passed around out of sight so that his exact location became again uncertain. About forty of the villagers were aroused and the barn was surrounded, and early in the morning reinforcements arrived. Arming themselves with pitchforks, the tedious task of turning over all the hay in the barn was begun, and proceeded for some time when the missing man was discovered concealed in an upper loft.
No sooner was the locality of his concealment reached than the murderer opened fire; he being armed with two Smith & Wesson 44 calibre self cock-ing revolvers. The man in advance fell back behind a beam for cover and drawing his revolver returned the fire.
After a lively scrimmage and exchange of several shots the fugitive disappeared.

Sheriff Bridgeman appearing upon the scene a call for twenty volunteers was made, to invade the premises and bring out the culprit dead or alive, a promise at the same time being made to give each his full share of the reward for the capture. The required number was soon mustered and armed and under the lead of the sheriff, entered the large barn, where a demand was made to surrender. No response was made and finally the posse proceeded to another barn where a like demand was made and this time a response came. Then followed a long parlay lasting several hours during which the District Attorney was sent for at the request of Almy and a long interview was held. Finally, wounded in several places, and exhausted the assassin handed over his brace of arms to the officers and surrendered, after being assured that he should not be molested by the mob outside, and with great difficulty he was borne to the lower floor and conveyed to the Hotel where his injuries were attended to by a surgeon, and it was discovered that the larger bone in the lower part of the left leg was broken, and several flesh wounds were discovered, one in the scalp. He passed a restless night Thursday under close guard. To his captors he made strong protestations of innocence of any intention to kill Christie Warden, declaring that his love for her was so desperate that he had left his situation in Massachusetts and returned to Hanover, spending several nights in the woods and in barns, waiting for an opportunity to obtain an interview, which her parents denied him at the that fateful night, he declares he intended to threaten to shoot himself in her presence, and while holding her by the ankle, the revolver was accidentally discharged, making an ugly wound, and it was then he fired the shot that killed her, to end her sufferings. His stories are rambling and incoherent, and are not believed by the officials. He was arraigned upon a charge of murder Friday morning.

He waived examination and pleaded not guilty, by advice of the District Attorney.

THE STOLEN SHIP.

In the year 1860 I was one of the crew of the British survey brig Advance, which was surveying the islands to the south of the Sandwich group. Kingman shoal, Palmyra island and other shoals and islands had not been closely surveyed, and we were spending the summer in this work. The brig was a craft of 200 tons, and being a government vessel was under strict discipline.

About the middle of September we were at Fanning island, when a heavy gale came up from the west, and we had to run for the open sea to the east. The gale struck us about 3 o'clock in the afternoon and hung to us until noon the next day. During this time we were running a little east of north and having all we could do, and when the gale broke we were at least 200 miles to the northeast of our island. It was mid-afternoon before we got the brig about, and she had scarcely been headed back when a whaleboat came down upon us from the northwest, and when we got her crew aboard we heard a very interesting story.

There were eight of them—a first mate, two harpooners and five hands. All belonged to the British whaling bark Penrose, of Liverpool. Twenty days previously she had run into Honolulu and discharged half a cargo of oil and shipped three Portuguese sailors to replace hands who had been lost at sea. On leaving Honolulu she had cruised to the southward, taking a whale occasionally, and on the day the gale broke she lowered for whales about 200 miles north of the group we had been surveying. Three boats were down at once as the bark ran into a school. As the breeze was light only a shipkeeper was left aboard, and he was a sailor who was just recovering from a hurt.

The three Portuguese were in the captain's boat, which made fast to a big bull whale within a quarter of a mile of the bark and was immediately struck and disabled, and the line had to be cut. Meanwhile the other two boats had gone to the eastward after the school, and they had no sooner made fast than their victim ran off at full speed. Owing to the direction of the wind the shipkeeper could not work down to the captain. His boat was a wreck, but was acting as a float to sustain the crew. In this emergency the three Portuguese offered to swim to the bark and return with a spare boat, and they were told to go. They reached the craft in safety, but had no sooner got aboard than the yards were trimmed, her head was brought to the south, and she sailed within 300 feet of the captain as she made off. The dark skinned rascals made no bones of the fact that they were running away with the ship. Indeed, they boasted of it, and derided the men hanging to the stoven boat.

It was a heartless, cold blooded thing to do. The two other boats were five miles to the eastward, and it was an hour after the bark made off before the men cut loose from their dead whales to fathom the mystery. They found the wreck of the captain's boat, to discover that only one single man remained with it, the others having been pulled down by the sharks. By the time they had heard his story the bark was more than half a mile away, and just then the gale broke. The boats were laid head on to the sea and drifted slowly to the east, dividing their men so as to give each an equal show to live out the gale. During the night the second mate's boat was lost sight of and as it was never heard of again it must have been swamped. Had we been running a course the surviving boat could not have fetched us, but as we were brought about she got the chance to do so.

As soon as the story had been told our captain decided to go in search of the stolen bark. It was a question, however, whether she had outlived the gale. She must have received the full force of it, and being so short handed she was liable to disaster. The main question was whether she would scud or drift. We had adopted the former course, as the brig had a habit of flooding her decks when lying head on. The mate of the stolen bark, whose name was Cummings, felt certain that the Portuguese would let her drift. In that case we would have to cover a hundred miles of ocean to the westward before beginning to look for them. What did they want of the craft? What could they do with her? There was only one reasonable answer. They would run her down among the southern islands, find some safe spot to lay her away and then "have a good time." This meant eating, drinking, smoking and having no work to do. They would not dare to try a long voyage nor to put into any prominent port.

I was Mate Cummings' belief that the Portuguese would head for Christmas island, a hundred miles to the south of where we had been surveying, and the brig's course was accordingly laid. On the afternoon of the third day after picking up the boat we sighted the bark dead ahead. We were then not over twenty-five miles from the island. The stolen craft had evidently been taking things pretty easy. She was under short sail when we first espied her, although the weather was fine and the breeze fair. The thieves had no fear of pursuit, and perhaps all were captains, except the shipkeeper and would not obey each other's orders. We had her almost hauled up when the fellows became suspicious, then they set everything below and aloft, and to our intense chagrin we discovered that the bark was a faster sailer than the brig. It was 4 o'clock in the afternoon when we sighted her, and as darkness fell she had gained a couple of miles on us. Having got the alarm it was hard to tell what they would now do, but after a long consultation our captain decided to round Christmas island and lay a course for Jarvis island. The bark was headed directly south when we last saw her.

Next day at noon we were to the west of Christmas and running down on our course, when we suddenly discovered the bark on our starboard quarter, standing out from the southeast end of the island, where she had been in hiding to let us pass. She had not seen us on account of a wooded peninsula making out for several miles, and we felt sure we had her in a box. The wind was from the west, and it was a bit of a job to get the brig about, smart as we were. The bark was about five miles off as we headed for her. She couldn't go to the west; nor were there men enough aboard to turn her on her heel and beat her back to the northeast.

Her only recourse was to stand to the southwest, heading directly for us, or to fall off and run dead to the west. We all looked to see her head into the wind and wait to be boarded, but the rascal had not thought of it. She suddenly shifted her course to the west, and hoping to cut her off we shifted ours north-west. Each was now the leg of a triangle. It was plain from the start that we should be within a cable's length of her at the meeting point, even if we did not cut her off. She would have shore on one side and us on the other.

Each craft had all sail set. When within three miles of the bark we fired a gun for her to heave to, but not the slightest notice was taken of it. Our two pieces of ordnance were then shifted to the starboard side and loaded with solid shot. If the rascals refused to surrender they must take the consequences. Each craft held dead to its course, but again the bark proved her better sailing qualities. Instead of cutting her off as we hoped for, we were still a quarter of a mile away when she passed the point. The three Portuguese were shouting and cheering, while the white man was at the wheel. Orders were given to fire; and two solid shots went whizzing at her, but to pass over her without damage. We then fell into her wake and could not bring a gun to bear, and we had the further mortification to see her walking away from us. The Portuguese ran up the American flag and dipped it three times, and our crew fairly danced in their indignation. The only thing we could do was to follow her, but we lost her early that evening and were all at sea as to where we should set eyes on her again.

Three days later, having had only light breezes, we raised Enderbury island, which is the easternmost island of the Phoenix group. The wind had been fair for the bark to lay this course, and this group also offered the pirates a good refuge and a beautiful climate. We approached it from the west, ran into within two miles of the beach, and then worked slowly along the southern shore. The charts showed no haven of refuge on either the south or west shore, but located a bay on the north. We hoped to trap them, if they were there, by making a circuit of the island and coming upon them from a different direction unexpectedly.

Next day we had to work up the west shore against a head wind, and night came again before we had fairly turned the corner and headed to the east. We came to anchor again, but such was the impatience of Mate Cummings and his men that they set off in their whaleboat to explore the coast in advance. Ten miles to the east they found the bark anchored in the bay laid down on the chart. She was within two hundred feet of the beach, her sails furled and stowed, and was heard of before she was seen. The Portuguese were drunk, as they were singing and shouting so they could be heard half a mile away.

The mate should have returned and reported the case, but he did not. He believed his party strong enough to recapture his craft, and he therefore pulled down to make the attempt. He did not surprise the pirates, as he hoped to, and when he tried to board her was driven back by her boat in great disorder, nearly every man being hurt by blows of captain bars. It was nearly daylight before the boat returned to the brig, and as it was a perfect calm we decided to wait until daylight before making any further move. As day dawned there was every prospect of a continuance of the calm, and two boats, each containing eight armed men, were dispatched to get possession of the bark. Our first mate had charge of one and Cummings of the other, and I was in the first boat. Our instructions were to board at any sacrifice, but to spare the pirates for the gallows if possible.

After a row of two hours we came to the entrance of the bay, and there was the bark before us. She had a snug anchorage and everything aloft was as tidy as you please. She wasn't over half a mile away, as it was not a deep bay, and we were no sooner in sight than we heard a cheer from her decks, followed by the boom of a cannon and the sound of a round shot over our heads. In rummaging the vessel the men had discovered an old 6-pound cannon which had lain in the hold for many years. This they had hoisted out, loaded with a shot intended for the feet of a dead man, and fired from a carriage so poorly constructed that the gun dismounted itself. The bark lay astern toward us, as the tide was running out, and we pulled to board her on either bow.

Captain and mate had both left their boats, and these were now used by two of the pirates. While we were sweeping up they killed two men and wounded a third, and a fourth man was wounded as we boarded. The Portuguese ran to the cabin for shelter, and we found the white sailor dead at the foot of the mainmast, they having clubbed him to death the night before. While we were planning to attack them in the cabin, they dropped from the windows to swim ashore. The alarm was raised in time for the boats to overhaul them, but one resisted so desperately that he had to be killed.

The other two were brought aboard and made secure, and about noon the brig came down. They were transferred to her, and that evening, while in the cabin to be questioned, one of them attacked the captain and was shot by the second mate, who had them in charge. The other committed suicide, and thus the villains were got rid of without trial or expense.—Queer Tales of the Sea.

THE CANDIDACY of Mr. Allen is gaining ground rapidly. He is a new, clean man and arouses the enthusiasm of the younger element of the Republican party.

THERE is a prospect of a lively contest on the nomination of the candidate for County Commission this fall. Mr. Bishop's friends will have to work hard to secure his renomination.

ON THE 3rd page we present a portrait of the reigning Emperor of China, and upon the 7th page will be found an interesting account of the Bennington celebration. Other inside pages contain matter of especial interest, to which we invite attention.

AN INVITATION has been extended to General William Cogswell, M. C., to stump the state of Ohio this fall, but the General will probably be unable to accept on account of other engagements.

BY THE vote of a majority of those who thought it advisable to attend the polls and cast a ballot upon the question of adopting the provisions of the municipal lighting statute, the town goes on record as favoring the plan of municipal ownership and control of an electric lighting establishment. It now remains to ascertain what is the best and most economical system and finally to make the necessary appropriations to meet the expenses of installation and maintenance.

If the town is as ready to appropriate the money as it was to adopt the provisions of the statute, the sooner that is done, after the committee has investigated the subject and procured the necessary bids or estimates, the better it will be, for evenings are beginning to grow long and it will be but a short time before electric lights will be needed, if such lights are ever a necessity in a town like Peabody.

The entire committee, with the single exception of Nicholas M. Quint, have already been over the ground pretty thoroughly, while serving in a similar capacity under a previous appointment, which will materially lighten the burden now imposed and should be the means of expediting the work of investigation and ensure an early report. It is to be hoped, however, a better system can be secured than the one previously talked of. The experience gained in the interval of delay having demonstrated that for a place like Peabody other systems offer superior advantages.

THE CAPTURE of Almy, the Haverhill murderer, furnishes food for reflection in police as well as other circles. The fact of his remaining in the immediate vicinity of his atrocious crime which all christendom was up in arms looking for him in the most remote localities, may be taken either as evidence of uncommon sagacity for one of his class, or it may be attributed to force of circumstances. Probably however the culprit staid in the locality at first to throw his pursuers off the track.

The reasons given by the assassin for his homicidal act, are hardly worthy of belief, particularly if reports of acquaintances in this vicinity can be relied upon, about his exhibiting the photograph of his victim and remarking "That is my Christie and if she don't marry me she won't marry anybody." These remarks taken in connection with the subsequent acts indicate a predetermination to murder the young lady whenever he became satisfied that his suit was hopeless.

One of the most remarkable features of the capture was the episode when, pointing the instrument of death toward his head and threatening if safe conduct were not guaranteed, to send a bullet through his own brain. His failure to commit suicide in the situation he was then in, with the almost unavoidable expectation of his horrible crime upon the gallows looming up before his vision, proves how tenaciously one clings to life, even when to perpetuate life can bring nothing but sorrow and intense suffering.

It is a matter of congratulation, that the armed populace who surrounded the scene of the capture restrained the impulse to mob violence, which although scarcely exhibited in that assemblage, must from the nature of the circumstances been uppermost in many minds. A few hundred miles west, such a scene of quiet demeanor under such provoking conditions, would have been considered miraculous.

ESSEX COUNTY.

One cigar dealer in Lynn adopted a novel plan yesterday to do business. The recent Sunday law scare has made him timid, so this time when a man wanted to buy a cigar or piece of tobacco, he sold him a box of matches and made him a present of the cigars or tobacco—Lynn Daily Press.

A West Lynn man has a bean pot that has been in constant use for the past 40 years.

The second ball of the season was held at the Masconomo House, Manchester on Wednesday evening. It was a brilliant affair, surpassing anything of the kind ever held there. The floor was under direction of Mr. Winslow Nickerson of Boston, and the music was furnished by the Cadet Orchestra of Salem. Senator McPherson and a long list of other people of note and fashion were present.

The Lynn police had a grand outing in Lynnfield on Tuesday.

Newburyport bait seiners are reported to have netted so far this season $10,000.

Blue fish are running up the Merrimack River for the first time in several years.

A Beverly man has been fined $8 for riding a bicycle on Manchester sidewalk.

Deputy Sheriff Wm. H. Hood of Danvers has resigned, and will go to Holyoke to accept a position in a wheel factory.

Rev. Clarence Pike has resigned the pastorate of the Union Congregational church at Salisbury point, which he has filled for the past seven years. He will remove to Vermont, where it is hoped his health will improve.

The Danversport depot was entered on Tuesday night through the window in the ticket office. The office was completely ransacked and several articles belonging to Station Agent Ham were taken. The thieves did not get into the safe.

At Gloucester on Sunday morning fire partially destroyed a brick building owned by Herbert Fears. Loss, $1000; insured.

Willard Reed of Cliftondale, who was graduated at Harvard this summer, has been made principal of Sandwich Academy.

The Gale Park, on Chestnut street, Haverhill contains 60,000 square feet, and Dr. Webster has the contract for grading it.

Benjamin R. Knight of Marblehead has recorded an assignment of all his property to Phillip B. Lindsay for the benefit of his creditors.

The slaughter house and stable of Dennis Lerner at Salisbury Plains, was burned on Tuesday with contents. Loss about $600.

Ground was broken on Monday morning for the cellar of the new association building at Danvers Centre, which is to be occupied by the E. & A. Mudge Shoe Company.

There were 32 deaths in Lynn during the past week, the largest number recorded in the given period for several years. Twelve of the cases were caused by cholera infantum.

Joseph Ross of Ipswich has secured the contract to build the new stone bridge over the Artichoke River, at Plummer's Springs, for $1950. There were three bids, one being at $2250.

There are some 85 wagons delivering milk in Lynn and 200 licensed dealers. 1100 cans a day come in by rail from New Hampshire to the Lynn Ice Company. Some 1900 cans are sold in Lynn daily.

The town of Andover is the first in Essex county to pay its county tax. Andover's taxes are $13 on the $1000, and the town has no debt except its bonds for the construction of its water works. One of these is paid every year. There are no sinking funds.

J. H. Winchell & Co. of Haverhill started up their power on Tuesday, and the factory is open on the non-union, but not free shop, principle. The firm have about 20 cutters at work and are having plenty of applications from workmen for jobs in other departments.

Joseph Shea, who resides near the Annisquam church, Gloucester, while excavating some land, during the past few days has exhumed ten human skulls and a stone tobacco pipe of peculiar mould. It is supposed that his find was made on the site of a former Indian burial ground.

Chas. J. Kuphal, a Boston decorator at work in Haverhill, was arrested for drunkenness in the latter city on Tuesday, the next morning he was found dead in the cell having hanged himself. Fellow workmen say he had been acting strangely, and possibly he might have been insane rather than intoxicated.

NOTED AND QUOTED.

Some of the new conditions to which the use of the electric light gives rise have a grotesque phase. In a town in Connecticut a new industry has sprung up. It appears that the strong light of the arc lamps has the effect of attracting worms out of the earth. An ingenious boy conceived the idea of turning this peculiar phenomenon to account, and scooping up the worms into a basket nightly, he started a trade with the local fisherman for the bait which they are always glad to get. The youngster was in a fair way to fortune when the secret of his quiet little business was discovered, and now groups of boys with tin cans can be seen every night at work under the electric lights in the development of this new branch of commerce.

The man who wrote "The Sword of Bunker Hill" received only $10.—Charlestown Enterprise.

The man who wrote "Home Again" received only 25 cents. Bernard Covett is dead, but Marshall S. Pike is living, in his 74th year, in the little hamlet of Fayville, in this State. At the time he wrote his song it sold for 25 cents a copy. The publisher gave his note and a few copies, of which Pike sold one. The publisher failed and the note was worthless. It would make a fine testimonial to the old minstrel if every one who has sung "Home Again" should send 25 cents, the price of a copy, to his hermitage. It would be a novel and acceptable tribute to the man whose song it is safe to say is in the mouth of every man, woman and child who can sing.—Lynn Item.

The Democratic New Haven Register is sound on the currency question. It says: "We regard the free silver epidemic as one to be stoutly resisted from whatever quarter it comes. It is fraught with danger to the prosperity of the country and to the welfare of the country and to the welfare of the party giving it in its official recognition."

Republicans are competent to nominate their candidates, and they are this year inclined to resent interference which takes that prerogative out of their hands. For that reason it will not be surprising if Allen shows up a little stronger this week than he has before. It will not be Mr. Crapo's fault if this is not so, but rather his misfortune.—Worcester Telegram.

The Attleboro Sun says: "If Wm. W. Crapo is the next governor of Massachusetts, he will owe it to Wm. E. Barrett of Melrose and the men who favored his nomination for the office."

The Republican party has always represented the best principles of good government, and from the beginning of our party right down through the years, the tendency and drift of every force with which it has been connected have been toward the emancipation of man, to raise the dignity of human labor, and the equal distributions upon all shoulders of the rights of citizenship, as well as the correlation duties of citizenship.—Collector Fasset.

The Russian Minister of Finance is reported to be devoting his serious attention to the condition of the cereal markets of this country. Fortunately while European countries are counting how much breadstuff they will have to buy, we are only calculating the amount we have to sell.

The association of economic entomologists has just held its first meeting in Washington. The object of the association is to save the $38,000,000 worth of crops destroyed annually by insects. They report success in regard to one pest, as by introducing a bacteriological disease they have obtained an undoubted cinch on the "chinch bug."

In Berlin when the Russian-Polish emigrants were inclined to be riotous a steam fire engine and a well directed hose pipe quickly brought them to terms, and a measure of cleanliness. Our police will do well to make a note of this treatment.—N. Y. Mail and Express.

A new Haitian Ministry has been formed, and everything is reported quiet on the Island.

It is generally believed that England is strictly a free trade country, but this is utterly false as a matter of fact. England has (in Great Britain and Ireland) 133 customs districts, each of which has a collector and subordinates. London has nearly 1,606 custom officers; Liverpool about 700—for the two ports nearly 2,300 customs officials. Does that look like England having free trade? And here is a list of dutiable articles compiled from the English tariff: Alcohol, ale, beer, brandy, playing cards, chicory, chloroform, chloral hydrate, cigars and cigarettes, cocoa, coffee, codlin, cologne water, cordials, currants, essence of spruce, ether, figs, fig cake, preserved fruit (in spirits), naphtha, pickles, gold and silver plate, plums and prunes, raisins, soap, gin, rum, whisky, and other spirits, wine and, varnish and besides these, there are about ninety or one hundred articles, chiefly from America, and principally patent medicines, which are held to be liable to duty at the rate of $3.36 per gallon. (See "Docket's Summary of the British Tariff.")

It is one thing to be free trade in theory and quite another to be free trade in actual practice.

We hope that our democratic friends will weigh these facts.—New York Mail and Express.

Resolutions of Respect.

WHEREAS the Lord in his infinite wisdom has removed from our midst by death William Henry Little, a most estimable citizen and honorary member of our association, venerable in years and crowned with honor by his fellow citizens, and

WHEREAS we wish to place on our record some acknowledgment of his valuable services as a past member of the fire department as Chief Engineer, and otherwise as a token of respect to his memory, Therefore be it

RESOLVED, that the notice of his death was received with feelings of profound sorrow.

RESOLVED, that this association has lost a most valuable adviser and wise counselor, one whose sympathies were always for the firemen.

RESOLVED, that we tender to the stricken family our heartfelt sympathies in their bereavement.

RESOLVED, that these resolutions be spread upon a record of the Peabody Veteran Firemen's Association, and a copy sent to the family of the deceased.

Attention! Everybody!! SCROFULA

Do you love a cool and refreshing drink of Soda or Moxie? If you do, call for one of Stevens' Best. We can furnish you six days in the week, but on the seventh you will have to go dry. We have at our store all of the stations of both electric and horse cars running in and out of Peabody; but on the seventh day, or Sunday, you will be obliged to stand out of door in the heat or the rain as the case might be, as we have had a notice served on us by the so-called Law and Order League of Peabody, denying us the right to sell Soda, Confectionery, Cigars or Tobacco on that day. Therefore, we were obliged to close as we could not furnish, could not keep open.

COD BLESS PEABODY!!

She needs it! 10,000 inhabitants and not a hotel or public house in the place! No inducements for strangers to visit us! No wonder our business is dull! No wonder our factories lay idle, our tanneries shut up and all business at a standstill! What we want is liberal sentiment and not littleness of mind! Then we shall grow and prosper as other Towns round about us.

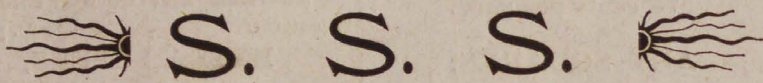

Don't think we are losing courage at this state of affairs. We hope to see them righted and to live to see the good old Town once more redeemed and made prosperous as in the days gone by.

We have a large and fine stock of goods in our store, and we shall try to sell you as cheap as elsewhere. All fruits in their season. Choice Cigars, Confectionery, Tobacco and a thousand things too numerous to mention.

Will try to give you a lunch as well as we know how.
Polite clerks always in attendance.

We invite all to visit us during our great annual mark-down and clearance sale of all kinds of summer footwear, which commences today.

We begin this sale at an earlier date than usual this season, as we have several lines of ladies' gents', misses' and children's colored and fancy summer shoes which we are desirous of clearing out entirely.

On these we shall make the price so low that you will see it is for your interest to buy of us as you have several months yet in which to wear these styles of shoes.

Come early before the lots are so much broken that you cannot secure sizes.

We have marked the price on all Tennis Shoes (sneakers) away below cost. Men's, Boys' and Youths', all sizes, as low as 37 1-2c. per pair.

Cut prices on all kinds of ladies' shoe dressing.

A REAL LUXURY!

Looking out over the many homes of this country, we see thousands of women wearing away their lives in household drudgery that might be materially lessened by the use of a few cakes of SAPOLIO. If an hour is saved each time a cake is used, if one less wrinkle gathers upon the face because the toil is lightened, she must be a foolish woman who would hesitate to make the experiment, and he a churlish husband who would grudge the few cents which it costs.

If your grocer sends you anything in place of SAPOLIO, send it back and insist upon having just what you ordered. SAPOLIO always gives satisfaction. On floors, tables, and painted work it acts like a charm. For scouring pots, pans, and metals it has no equal. Everything shines after it, and even the children delight in using it in their attempts to help around the house.

Grocers often substitute cheaper goods for SAPOLIO to make a better profit. Send back such articles and insist on having just what you ordered.

SCROFULA

Is that impurity of the blood which produces unsightly lumps or swellings in the neck; which causes running sores on the arms, legs, or feet; which develops ulcers in the eyes, ears, or nose, often causing blindness or deafness; which is the origin of pimples, cancerous growths, or "humors," which, fastening upon the lungs, causes consumption and death. It is the most ancient of all diseases, and very few persons are entirely free from it.

How Can It Be CURED

By taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which, by the remarkable cures it has accomplished, has proven itself to be a potent and peculiar medicine for this disease. If you suffer from scrofula, try Hood's Sarsaparilla. "Every spring my wife and children have been troubled with scrofula, my little boy, three years old, being a terrible sufferer. Last spring he was one mass of sores from head to feet. We all took Hood's Sarsaparilla, and all have been cured of the scrofula. My little boy is entirely free from sores, and all four of my children look bright and healthy." W. B. ATHERTON, Passaic City, N. J.

To the Hon. Board of Commissioners of the County of Essex:
Respectfully represent the Selectmen of Peabody in said county that Lowell street, a highway in said town, is imperfectly defined and of uncertain and unequal width, to the inconvenience of both the town and the abutters.

Wherefore, we respectfully petition that you grant a hearing and view said highway with reference to defining, widening and straightening the same between Forest St., and Newbury St., upon said highway and adjudicate thereon as you may deem public convenience to require.

Court of County Commissioners, July Term, A. D. 1891, held by adjournment at Salem, August 4, 1891.

On the Petition aforesaid, ordered, That said petitioners give notice to all persons and corporations interested therein, that said Commissioners will meet at the Town Hall, in said Peabody, on Wednesday, the ninth day of September, next, at nine o'clock, A. M., by publishing an attested copy of said Petition, and of this Order thereon, in the Peabody Press, a newspaper printed in said Peabody, three weeks successively, the last publication to be fourteen days at least before the said ninth day of September. And also with an attested copy of said Petition and this Order, thirty days at least, and by posting up an attested copy thereof in two public places in said town, fourteen days at least before the said ninth day of September at which time and place said Commissioners will proceed to view the premises, and take such order in relation to the Prayer of said Petition, as by law they may be authorized to do.

There is nothing, (unless it be the Sewing Machine) that has lightened woman's labor as much as Dobbins' Electric Soap, constantly sold, since 1869. Now, why rub and toil, and wear out yourself and your clothes, on washday, when this perfect soap is provided, to lighten your labor, and save your clothes? If you have ever used it, in the 22 years we have made and sold it, you know that it is the best, purest, and most economical soap made. If you haven't tried it, ask your grocer for it now. Be sure and get the genuine, with our name on the wrapper.

READ THIS TWICE.

It is not the selling price alone, that must be considered, in arriving at a knowledge of the value of an article. There is as much real pure soap in a bar of Dobbins' Electric as in four bars of any other soap made, and it will, if used according to directions, do four times as much work as any other. Its cost is but a very slight advance on that of inferior soap. Insist upon Dobbins' Electric.

Had the Desired Effect! II.

MANVILLE, R. I., March 8, 1891.
I, the undersigned, suffered from epilepsy for 5 years, had no appetite and could do no work whatever; consulted a number of doctors, but all said there was no remedy for my disease. I then took Pastor Koenig's Nerve Tonic, and am now in perfect health, and work all the time. Thousand thanks to your remedy.

PHILIP MONGEON.

95 PROSPECT ST., NEWARK, N. J., March 2, 1891.
I got some of Pastor Koenig's Nerve Tonic for nervousness and sleeplessness and it helped me; the first time I took it I had the best sleep I had had for several months. I also know friends of mine who used it and said it is the best nerve tonic they ever used. I write this that some sufferer may use your medicine and be helped by it.

VERMONT'S GREAT DAY.

A GENERAL ACCOUNT OF THE CELEBRATION of the Centennial Anniversary of the Admission of Vermont as a State into the Union and the Dedication of the Bennington Battle Monument.

BENNINGTON, Vt., Aug. 20.—Bennington's greatest day dawned beautiful and fair. Everybody rejoiced thereat, and at an early hour all was bustle and stir with the arriving, by team and early train, of many thousands of visitors to join the thousands already here, the drum beat of marching bodies and the hurly of preparations for the parade. It seemed as though the surrounding country for miles had emptied its entire population into the historic town. The decorations were the admiration and wonder of every rural eye.

Colonel Webb, accompanied by a mounted Grand Army post, went over to General McCullough's house and escorted President Harrison to the Soldiers' home. Governor Page and all the living ex-governors were on the piazza to greet him. The president got out of his carriage and was taken into the house for a few minutes. After being introduced to the distinguished guests present, the president immediately resumed his place in the carriage, waiting for the procession to start. At 9 o'clock the guns of Fuller's battery boomed the signal for divisions to commence formation. The column, except carriages, formed on the parade ground and as usual was slow in getting started. It was 10:30 before it was finally under way. The Putnam phalanx of Hartford, which was given the honor of escorting the president, moved the line, and then a score of carriages containing the president and distinguished guests followed along in rapid order.

The Procession Then Moved in the order previously arranged. The camp ground, on which the Soldiers' home is situated, was well filled with people when the procession moved. It was noisy, boisterous or enthusiastic crowd. It was an assemblage of people who came to see and not to shout. The president doffed his hat in salute to every manifestation of applause.

As the forenoon progressed the sun shone out hot, but the atmosphere was pure and wholesome. Altogether it was a grand day so far as weather was concerned for the celebration. The streets were lined with visitors, viewing the procession as it passed on to the monument ground, a mile and a half from the starting point. The Vermont militia, which followed along after the Putnam phalanx, was pleasantly received by the spectators.

Attractive Military Bodies.

There were hosts of people here from the vicinity of Albany and Troy and other cities in that section of New York state. There was some rivalry among the military organizations, sufficient to give zest to the marching of the men here who belong to the New York National Guard. There were two organizations especially in the procession which had a large number of adherents here—The Thirty second Independent company of Hoosac Falls and the Tibbets cadets of Troy. Both organizations were cheered lustily as they marched through the streets. But the organization which elicited the greatest applause was the cadets from the United States Military academy at West Point. The cadets marched in fine style, and their military precision was not less admired than their physical excellence. Cushing's United States battery from Newport, R. I., was also received with applause by the populace. Indeed all of the organizations in the line made a first-rate appearance and the procession as a whole was a very creditable one, and it might be said, even a very remarkable one for a place the size of Bennington.

The column moved through North, Gage, Stafford and Main streets to the reviewing stand. Here a short halt was made, to allow the reviewing party to take position in the stand. The column then passed in review before President Harrison. The latter received many flattering greetings from the marching column and acknowledged the same by bowing. The procession continued to march through Main street and Monument avenue to the massive and lofty pillar which will tell generations yet unborn of the valor and patriotism of the Green Mountain boys of 1777. Here the first division, except batteries, was massed on the west side of the monument; the second and third divisions, except carriages, on the east side. The batteries then took positions and fired a national salute of twenty-one guns.

Dedication Ceremonies.

Meantime the president and party, the orator of the day, Edward J. Phelps, Governor Page and other distinguished speakers and guests, with the representatives of the press, about 300 people in all, had taken their positions on the platform at the base of the monument. Around and about the open spaces were black with the multitudes gathered from many states to witness the ceremony of dedication. When all were in their places and quiet had been secured the exercises at the monument were opened with an introductory address by Hon. Wheelock G. Veazey, president of the day, followed by prayer by Rev. Charles Parkhurst, D. D., of Boston, the chaplain; an address of welcome by Governor C. S. Page, followed by the formal transfer of the monument to the state by ex-Governor B. F. Prescott of New Hampshire, president of the Bennington Battle Monument association. Governor Page accepted the monument on behalf of the state, and then the oration was delivered by Hon. Edward J. Phelps of Burlington.

Applause greeted the finish, as the beginning of Mr. Phelps' address, which was renewed with intensity as President Harrison was introduced and spoke of his gratification at being present. It was late in the afternoon when the president finished, and the exercises, long to be remembered in the annals of the Green Mountain state, were brought to a close with music and benediction.

The divisions then reformed in proper order, with the carriages of each division in the rear, and marched through Monument avenue, Main and North streets to Camp Vermont, where the troops and other organizations were dismissed.

The Banquet.

Following the exercises of dedication at the monument a banquet was held in a large tent on the grounds of the Soldiers' home. Tables had been set for 3,000, but that number of plates was insufficient to accommodate all who desired to participate in the festivities. Caterer Cook of Boston, with a large corps of assistants, carried out the arrangements in an admirable manner. Before the speaking began a great number of people from the outside were permitted to flock into the tent and occupy the space in the aisles. There were probably 5,000 persons present when the president was introduced. The president's voice was quite hoarse, but he is evidently enjoying good health, and what little cold he has is not of serious kind. Seated at the banquet table in company with President Harrison were Governor Page of Vermont, General Veazey, ex-Minister Phelps, Governor Russell of Massachusetts, Governor Tuttle of New Hampshire, General Alger of Michigan, Adjutant General Peck, Colonel B. S. Small, Mayor Valentine, ex-Governor Prescott of New Hampshire, ex-Governor Rice of Massachusetts, Attorney General Miller and others prominent in civil and military circles. The tables at which these gentlemen partook of the generous repast were handsomely decorated.

In calling the company to order, W. G. Veazey, the president of the occasion introduced President Harrison who made a speech.

At the conclusion of the president's remarks, John B. Carney, chairman of the citizens' committee of fifty, advanced to the side of the president's table and presented Mr. Harrison with a gold medal as a memento of the celebration. The medal, which was pinned on the president's coat, bore a likeness of the Bennington monument.

"It needed not this memento," said President Harrison, "to remind me of this auspicious occasion."

Governor Russell of Massachusetts was then introduced and heartily cheered. Other addresses were made by Governor Tuttle of New Hampshire, Major-General Howard of New York, General Alger of Michigan, Secretary of War Proctor, Attorney General Miller, General Webb of New York, Gen. McCullough, ex-Governor Rice of Massachusetts and others.

After the Banquet.

A fine display of fireworks, witnessed by great crowds of people, was sent up from the grounds of the Soldiers' home last evening. A notable feature of the display was the grand historical pageant of fire pictures representing heroic scenes in Vermont's past history.

SCHEME FELL THROUGH.

Many Persons of Augusta, Me., Find Themselves Badly Swindled.

AUGUSTA, Me., Aug. 14.—The sensation in Augusta investment circles is that an interest in the Bennington monument in this section is interested has "gone out of business." Its headquarters were in New York, and through an agent various sums were picked up here. One party put in $10,000 and another mortgaged his property and invested his all. Clerks and professional men were caught. It is learned from authentic sources that they received their July dividends in checks, which were placed in the banks here, but when sent to New York for collection were returned, there being no deposit there to meet them. Further developments are anticipated.

The name of the concern is the American Trust company of New York, with offices at 173 Broadway, and holding land in Texas. Their agent has been in this city for nearly a year, but recently departed, and it is said has gone to New York. He canvassed extensively for investments during his stay here, and succeeded in obtaining many subscribers to the stock. His board bill is unpaid. The checks for the July dividends received by holders of the stock were cashed when sent in at once, but several parties kept their checks for two or three weeks, and on depositing them the paper was sent to New York by the banks, but were returned marked "no funds."

At one time there was a movement to establish an eastern branch of the concern in this city, and a party of prominent business men met in a leading attorney's office to organize, but the scheme fell through. A Gardiner man visited the concern's office in New York last winter and found some fine offices and a good set of books.

Seven Years in Prison.

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 19.—Charles Lawrence, ex-assistant cashier of the Bank of Keystone National bank, who pleaded guilty in the United States court to two indictments, charging him with making false entries in the bank's books and with conspiring with Gideon W. Marsh, president of the bank, to make false entries, was sentenced by Judge Biddle to eight years' imprisonment in the Eastern penitentiary, and to pay a fine of $100 and costs. Judge Buller subsequently considered Lawrence's sentence and reduced it to seven years' imprisonment.

Nelson Lowers His Record.

INDEPENDENCE, Ia., Aug. 17.—Nelson went an easy mile in 2:10 1/4, last quarter 30 1/4, on Saturday.

This "easy" mile means a new record for the famous Maine horse. He trotted the mile in 2:10 1/4 last season, and has done some remarkable work this year, but until Saturday nothing that eclipsed his great effort of ten months ago. The track at Independence is the kite-shaped one controlled by Williams of Axtel and Allerton fame.

Ex-President Polk's Widow Dead.

NASHVILLE, Aug. 15.—Mrs. James K. Polk, widow of the tenth President of the United States, died yesterday at her home in this city at the age of 88.

Mrs. Polk was stricken down Wednesday evening at 7 o'clock, just after returning from a drive. In a short while she reacted and consciousness returned, and from that time until her death she apparently suffered no pain.

Boston Clothing House Robbed.

BOSTON, Aug. 18.—Frederick M. Phillips, late cashier for G. W. Simmons & Co., Oak Hall, is missing, and with him, it is rumored, from $500 to $10,000 of the funds of the firm. Phillips is a married man living at Reading, Mass. Two weeks ago last Friday morning he kissed his wife good by as was his custom on going to work in the morning, and he has not since been seen.

A Monument for Boston Elks.

BOSTON, Aug. 19.—A symbolic monument is to be erected at Mt. Hope cemetery by the Boston lodge of Elks, and work is to be begun this week. They will move a large Roxbury pudding-stone boulder from the Highland district to the cemetery and upon this will be placed a bronze elk. The dedication will take place in September or early in October.

Bicycle Records Broken.

SPRINGFIELD, Mass., Aug. 14.—A. A. Zimmerman of the New York Athletic club's bicycle team lowered the half-mile ordinary bicycle record to 1:10 1/4 in a trial against time at Hampden park last evening. The former record for the distance was made by William W. Windle at Peoria last fall and was 1:10 4/5.

Wound Resulted Fatally.

HOLYOKE, Mass., Aug. 17.—Maurice Brady, a young man who was shot early Friday morning by Christian H. Voight, died at his father's house yesterday morning. The police were notified and Voight was arrested. Brady was not in the party which had been assaulting Voight.

NEWS SUMMARY.

Fred Douglas has tendered his resignation as U. S. Minister to Hayti. Mr. Dillion has invited Parnell to enter into an arrangement for a committee to distribute a portion of the Paris fund which is now $40,000 for the relief of evicted tenants. Mr. Parnell is not likely to see it in that light.

Reports from Hong Kong, state that the fire of discontent is still smoldering in North China, and occasional riots are reported. The mission stations near Canton are said to have been attacked, but no particulars were received. Two of the Wusueh rioters on trial voluntarily confessed that they murdered two foreigners during the Wusueh riots. The two prisoners were accordingly sent back to the Kuang Chi District and executed July 5. Their heads were hung up at Wusueh as a warning to other evil doers. A correspondent at Tientsin writes under date of July 29 that all is quiet there and that no troubles are anticipated. The Naval Department was ordered several war ships to reinforce the China squadron.

Forty cases of sunstroke in New York occurred on Tuesday.

The annual exhibition of the Vermont Association of Road and Trotting Horse Breeders began at Newport on Tuesday.

Massachusetts won two championships at the National association of oarsmen regatta, on Wednesday. Billy Caffrey of the Lawrence Canoe Club bore away the laurels for Essex County. The second was won by the Arlington two-oared crew. This championship comes to New England for the second year in succession. Caffrey holds the amateur championship.

Bennington, Vermont, has had a larger army within her borders this week than she had when Stark defeated Baum—but of a different kind.

William Bogle, a Scotchman, who suggested the name of Melrose, when that town was set off from Malden, in remembrance of his native township, died Saturday afternoon at the age of 78 years. He leaves one son, Colonel Archibald Bogle, who served in the Rebellion, and two daughters.

James Lynn who has not been living with his wife, entered a store kept by her at Pawtucket, R. I., on Wednesday and shot her while she stood behind the counter with her infant in her arms. The woman ran into the street where two more shots were fired, one taking effect in the back of the neck and killing her instantly. Lynn was arrested with the weapon in his hands.

The Adventists have been holding camp meeting at Alton Bay this week. After a hearing upon the Abington shooting case on Wednesday, Judge Bouve said: "I cannot see anything in this case which should warrant the further holding of this man. I think it would be an abuse of justice if I should restrain the liberty of this man in any way, shape or manner. The authorities, of course, were warranted in detaining Stewart until an investigation could be made. Here is a man who was discharged by his employer for abusing his children and prying into things which were none of his business. We next find him in the house after the whole family had retired for the night. There is no doubt but what he broke into the house. He was asked by Stewart 'What he was there for?' Almost instantly he was shot by Finnerty. This was sufficient to warrant him in doing what he did. This case is another of those of which we have some sad examples of late of the danger attending the employment of men whom no one knows anything about. Mr. Clerk let the defendant be discharged, and I congratulate him that he escaped death himself, for I feel certain that he would have been killed if he had not done as he did." The decision of Judge Bouve was received with marked approval.

An unknown tramp shoemaker was found at Manchester, N. H., Wednesday in a dying condition, and expired on the way to the station. The letters "E. H." were marked on his left arm.

Memoranda found in his pocket showed that he had been in Haverhill, East Weymouth and Milbury, and boarded with a Mrs. Griffin in one of these towns in January, 1890.

Boston's Aldermanic Board was much agitated on Wednesday by the motion of Alderman Meyer as follows: "Ordered, that the Collector be directed to print on the tax bills of 1891, that the tax of this year is on a nine months' basis." When the vote was taken which "hoisted" the motion, Mr. Meyer was so confused by the deluge that he did not even call for the yeas and nays. The Board evidently did not propose to dig its own grave by announcing to voters that a year's levy was appropriated by them in nine months.

ONLY ONE SASSAPARILLA sold on the "No Benefit, No Pay" plan—only one could stand the test, viz: DANA'S.

Chili's President.

Senor Vicuna has been elected president of Chili by the Balmacedist provinces; but this may mean something or nothing. Balmaceda is still in his seat, and may not surrender it, and the insurgents may refuse to recognize Vicuna's election because they took no part in it. The situation is not much changed by this election, excepting that if Balmaceda surrenders his seat at the end of his term Vicuna may offer terms of peace to the insurgents which they will consider. Balmaceda had another candidate for the presidency, and so in a sense Vicuna's election is a defeat for him, which he may present in September by refusing to retire, under the pretext that public safety requires him to remain at the head of affairs.

Nobody knows just what the real situation is in Chili, for both sides tell stories to suit themselves and color dispatches in the same way; but it is generally believed that if Balmaceda's two new cruisers reach him in safety, he will be able to force the fighting and put the insurgents to extremities. At the same time it is considered uncertain on which side the new cruisers will fight!

REMARKABLE FACTS.

Heart disease is supposed to be incurable, but when properly treated a large proportion of cases can be cured. Thus Mrs. Elmira Hatch, of Elkhart, Ind., and Mrs. Mary L. Baker, of Ovid, Mich., were cured after suffering 20 years. S. C. Linburger, druggist at San Jose, Ill., says that Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure, which cured the former, "worked wonders for his wife." Levi Logan, of Buchanan, Mich., who had heart disease for 30 years, says two bottles made him feel like a new man. Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure is sold by Wm. T. Lee. Difficulties of Engineering.

In fixing the alignment of the Hoosac tunnel, in Massachusetts, at the bottom of a shaft 1,028 feet deep, the spiders prevented accurate work with plumb lines, until two cases were made enclosing the whole length of these lines. For shallow pits the spiders' webs can be broken by raising the lines and then lowering them to position shortly before fixing upon points; but in this instance the distance was so great as to require several hours before the vibration of the lines would cease, even with the bobs in vessels of mercury.

The suggestion is made that the lines might be freed from similar interferences by insulating the suspended apparatus and the bob from the earth and attaching a grounded electric light circuit to the wire, relying upon the dampness in the pit to give sufficient conductivity to the cobwebs to cause them to be seared by the escape when any cobweb connected the earth to the plumb wire.—Cor. Engineering.

Monkey Talk.

The several species of lower animals have commonly been credited with a language of their own; and now Prof. R. L. Garner has not only established in a scientific manner that monkeys talk to one another, but has actually acquired a smattering of the simian tongue. After years of assiduous study of monkeys at the zoological collections of New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati and Chicago, Prof. Garner at length hit upon the device of employing the phonograph to record the sounds made by one monkey in communication with another. A pair of monkeys, which had been kept in one cage, were separated and placed near the female, and her "talk" duly recorded on the cylinder. The phonograph was then taken into the room with the male, and made to repeat the sounds, which he manifestly recognized as made by his mate. His "talk" was then recorded, and being reported by the instrument was duly recognized by the female. Thus, as Prof. Garner points out in the Noth Review, where he reports these experiments, "for the first time in the history of philology, the simian tongue was reduced to record."

From this first step, progress was rapid. Other phonographic records were made, and by studying these sounds, repeating them over and over, and finally mastering them, Prof. Garner was prepared for addressing a monkey in the monkey's own language. Taking his place near the cage of a capuchin monkey, the professor uttered the word which he had translated "milk." At the first utterance he caught the monkey's attention; and the word being repeated again and again, the monkey spoke in answer and turned to the pan kept in the cage for him to drink from and finally brought the pan close up to the bars, repeating the word. Prof. Garner rewarded him with some milk, and the performance was repeated until the monkey had had his fill of milk and until the experimenter was satisfied that the same word was used every time. Subsequent investigation showed that this word, first interpreted "milk" was likewise used for "water" and really meant "drink" or "thirst."

By a like course of linguistic tests, the words for "hunger" or "to eat" were learned, and a forth word which is a "menace" or "cry of alarm." The Professor has made the acquaintance of many capuchins, and has found no one of them that does not use the two words for food and drink. From the experiments so far conducted it appears to have been determined that the simian tongue has about eight or more sounds, which may be changed by modulation into three or four times that number; they seem to be half-way between a whistle and a pure vocal sound; the sound used most is like "u," or "oo" in "shoot;" the next like "e" in "be."—Forest and Stream.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

The preliminary season of the TREMONT THEATRE will begin on Monday evening, Aug. 24, and the sale of seats in advance began Wednesday morning, Aug. 19. One of the best and most refined organizations of minstrels will be the opening attraction—Lew Dockstadter Minstrels. The corps has made a pronounced hit everywhere it has already been seen. Headed by the well known wit and scholarly comedian, Lew Dockstadter, it comprises in its lists also many fine singers and solo instrumentalists. Mr. Fred. Salcombe heading the vocalists, an English tenor of note, McIntire and Heath a capital "team" for song and dance and sketches, George Powers the well known comedian, Frank Girard, always welcome; Cain and Lorenzo in their very comical burlesque trapeze act; Perry and Magrew in a very funny boxing match, the wonderful three Marvelles in graceful grotesque dancing and a number of others, all the best of their profession. Mr. Dockstadter has always been noted for the refinement of his entertainments and in the present case accounts make him to have surpassed all his former offerings. Managers Abbey and Schoeffel will present a great array of attractions, among which can be named George Marion in "Mr. Maccaroni," Fanny Rice, "A Texas Steer" and Hoyt and Thomas's latest work: Stuart Robson, Nat Goodwin, John H. Russell's new company in his new City Directory, Rosina Vokes, Marie Wain Wriget. For opera the Casino Company and the Bostonians will both appear. The Cadets have a week of their new extravaganza and Edw. S. Willard and the illustrious Bernhardt will also play engagements.

Neil Burgess is making great preparations at the PARK THEATRE, Boston, for the production of "The County Fair," which he announces will open the early part of September, and continue for the entire theatrical season of 1891-2. He comes to Boston crowned with the laurels of a four years' continuous run in New York City, so there is no doubt as to his reception here. The stage of the Park Theatre has been entirely rebuilt to accommodate the machinery used in the great race effect in which five horses run continuously in full view of the audience for three-quarters of a mile. Many new and elaborate additions have been made to the scenic, mechanical and electrical equipment used in the New York run, and New Englanders may expect to see marvellous effects in this natural, home-like play.

The new Knowles-Frohman Theatre on Boylston and Washington streets, Boston, described in the Press some months ago, has been commenced. The Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York holds a mortgage for $225,000 and Henry Weil, a German millionaire, furnishes $100,000, for which he takes a second mortgage. When completed the theatre will be one of the largest as well as finest places of amusement in America. On the Washington-street side of the theatre will be a first class hotel. Both will be ready for occupancy in the spring. Mr. Frohman has leased the new theatre for $20,000 a year for the first two years. The ultimate rent will be $25,000 a year.

World's Fair Notes.

It is reported that the Prince of Wales, Emperor William of Germany and Shah of Persia all seriously contemplate visiting the World's Fair in 1893.

The managers of the great naval exhibition at Chelsea, England, have consented to allow the model of Nelson's ship the Victory, to be transferred to the Columbian Exposition.

More than $5,000,000 of Exposition work is now contracted for and is in progress.

A movement has been inaugurated by the Sons of the Revolution in New York to have October 12th celebrated throughout the world each year as "Discovery Day."

Sultan of Zanzibar has decided to make an extensive exhibit, and a request for space has been cabled.

Massachusetts will devote $10,000 to its educational exhibit. The State's entire appropriation is $75,000.

Buy Goods?

What is an Emporium? What goes into its make up? Why the term? The term at once suggests something large. A business conducted on an extensive scale. A mart of trade where everything of a special branch or several branches of a particular line are gathered together under one head. Such a combination properly managed affords at once immense advantages over single department stores. Advantages in the way of trading with one salesman. Buying your goods at one place. Quicker service. Contracting a single bill in place of three or four. And lower prices ALWAYS from the fact that the items of expense in running such a store are made smaller in a dozen ways. Such is our Emporium, and its popularity is best attested by our constantly increasing trade. Remember that we have four floors fully stocked with GOODS THAT SELL.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all other Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellow-men. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

Ice Water—Doctors Disagree.

A celebrated physician says "All ice-water drinking is bad," also that "a severe blow upon the body just over the solar plexus," (which in good United States language means an important portion of the nervous system located just back of the stomach,) "will cause almost instant death," and he further says "the sudden shock caused by a deluge of ice-water into the stomach has exactly the same effect upon the solar plexus as the blow, and may cause sudden death by its action upon it and through that on the heart." Another equally celebrated physician says, "Any dietion which unqualifiedly say that cold drinks are bad and hot drinks are good must be absurd" and further "cold water stimulates gastric secretion; therefore do not smile at your friend because he thinks a half-glass of ice-water before eating gives him an appetite and helps his digestion." In continuation we will say, drinking ice-water in copious draughts when overheated is injurious, if not dangerous, that is undeniable. But that the free drinking of water in some form in hot weather must be avoided, is undeniable, and is one of the greatest popular errors extant. When a person is perspiring freely, a vast amount of water is drawn from the body, which must be resupplied, or great injury is being done the physical health, and the foundation of some of the worst forms of kidney disease is being slowly but surely laid. Do not drink ice-cold water, but pure cool water; a little lemon-juice will improve its effectiveness. Plain soda water with a little acid is also excellent in hot weather. If from drinking too much ice-water you have stomach cramps, or are "water-logged" as it is called, or are attacked with Cholera morbus, Summer Complaints, diarrhea or dysentery, do not resort to alcoholic stimulating drinks, which irritate rather than allay the inflammation which has caused the trouble; but adopt the practice of taking daily just before retiring, during July and August, one tea-spoonful of Johnson's Anodyne Liniment in a little sweetened water, which will prevent all such attacks and ill effects from ice-water. In fact a little pamphlet sent free to any one by I. S. Johnson & Co., Boston, Mass., contains a vast amount of information about treating those summer troubles with that good old household remedy.

Footprints of the World's History.

Ben Franklin once made the statement, "Schools teach us the rudiments of language, but books teach us how to think; therefore, no man is truly educated unless he is a reader of books." Ben was right, but he lived in an age when books were so scarce, comparatively speaking, that but little of the pernicious in literature was tolerated. But in these days it is different. Your boys thirst for a knowledge of the world, and if you don't give them some wholesome reading to stoke that thirst, they will get hold of cheap, sensational stories that will poison their minds and do them terrible injury.

There is such a vast amount of this trashy stuff being poured into the market at the present time, that it is a relief to pick up a new book that is at once thrilling, romantic, wholesome, pure and true.

Such a work is "Footprints of the World's History," the latest and greatest work of the two celebrated historians, John Clark Ridpath and Wm. S. Bryan. These distinguished gentlemen, having won their laurels by independent writings, have co-operated on this work, and produced a gem "of the purest ray serene." It is not dry, uninteresting statements of the plain facts, but rather each of the most important events of history has been taken up and described by a master of language, who holds the reader entranced as he winds his way along the path of history, following carefully in the footprints of progress.

We are delighted with this superb volume. Perfect in thought, superb in style, and magnificent in execution. The buildings are sumptuous, as are also the many illustrations and colored plates. The Publishers have rightly concluded that such a gem should have a rich setting.

It is a valuable addition to literature. It is a book for the old as well as the young; the married as well as the single; the gay as well as the grave. Everybody will read it with equal eagerness and profit. It is sold only through agents, and the Publishers' advertisement appears in another column.

An interesting collection from Asiatic-Russian provinces is being exhibited on the Champs Elysee in Paris, and it is said will be taken to Chicago in 1893. The exhibition is in charge of Gen. Annenkoff, son of the Princess Dolgorouki (morganatic wife of Alexander II.), who is the head of the great trans-Caucasus railway into Turkestan and Afghanistan. The collection comprises natural products of Central Asia, and arms, clothing, jewels, and household articles of the various provinces, as well as a panorama of a battle in Turkestan, with scenic illustrations of the snow-capped mountains.

IT IS BECAUSE

The Cured are all Around You!

Fred L. Brown is a prominent citizen of Peabody, Me. Naturally energetic, it was hard to find himself the victim of ill disease. No appetite—when he did eat then came the agony of indigestion and deathly faintness in the morning at pit of stomach. Sick headache later in the day, and nature was constantly trying to throw off the impurity of his blood in the form of Boils and Abscesses. This was his condition. Well, you say, what of it? O, nothing, only this—FOUR BOTTLES of DANA'S SARSAPARILLA cured, yes, ACTUALLY CURED him. Had you rather be cured than suffer? If you had, remember DANA'S is the only SARSAPARILLA GUARANTEED TO CURE.

We Make the Kind that Cures!
WE GUARANTEE IT.
We refund the Money if not Benefitted!

THE SCHOOL HOUSES.

During the long vacation, the condition of the various school buildings has been looked after, and the necessary repairs have been made. The majority of the buildings are more than twenty years old, and the expense and care necessary to keep them in proper condition seems to increase with years. Those who were members of the school board when the buildings were new, can hardly realize the effects of the elements and the continued wear and tear of twenty years' service.

A building looks better and more substantial with a slated roof and probably is better; but a slate roof requires close watching, and the cost of repairing a few broken or displaced slates is quite heavy. It was the fashion, twenty or twenty-five years ago to equip the roofs of nearly every building with heavy wooden gutters and copings. These in some cases were quite elaborate, and looked well for a while, but heavy rains, hard frosts, and sudden thaws played havoc with their beauty, and rotting timber, perplexing leaks, and discolored ceilings followed. The copings and gutters have been removed from the larger buildings, and the rainfall from the rooms is received in a paved or concreted way.

On inspection of the boiler which heated the Center school house, its condition was found to be such, that a new one was absolutely necessary. The contract was awarded to Geo. H. Little, and the job is now completed, and all the connections are made. The new boiler is set at right angles to the old one, which gives it a more direct and effective chimney draught. It has greater capacity, and will produce a good steam pressure in much quicker time. The lower hallway has always been difficult to heat and ventilate. To obviate this, a register has been cut in the floor directly over the boiler; cold fresh air from the outside passes through a radiator underneath the register and on top of the boiler, and thereby a circulation is obtained that will warm and ventilate the hallways and entries. Direct and indirect heat will be obtained by this contrivance. In addition to these changes and improvements, the slated roof has been mended, a new set bowl and commode placed in the teachers' toilet room, and the room grained and varnished. The yard has been graded and the woodwork of the entire building thoroughly washed and cleaned.

The Wallis school house was carefully inspected by the state officials, and their suggestions and recommendations faithfully carried out. In many of the rooms the ceilings were found to be defective, and in two of them, the condition was such that the entire plastering was taken down and removed, and new ceilings were necessary. A new sink and extra faucets were placed in the basement, commode and set bowl for teachers, room grained and varnished, roof repaired, flat tin roof painted, windows and window cords repaired, and building washed and cleaned.

West Peabody school house, walls of rooms and lower hallway kalsomined, and roof repaired by slater.

No special repairs have been made on the Bowditch school building, save the mending of a few displaced slates, and the obliteration of the effects of the adjacent fire, by the setting of broken glass, and scraping and painting the blistered clapboards.

No special repairs were made at the Warren, Endicott or Felton school houses.

So, Peabody building had repairs on tin slated roofs, cellar whitewashed, and with all the other school houses received a thorough washing.

In nearly all repair jobs, it is impossible to make estimates of cost, or to issue calls for bids on any accurate specifications, consequently such work must be day work.

G. A. R. vs. Leather.

Union Post, No. 50, Peabody, Mass., was well represented at the Twenty-fifth National Encampment G. A. R., at Detroit, the past week. The members of the Post wore a neat and appropriate leather badge—red and blue with gold trimmings. The leather was contributed by the well-known firm of George Plumer & Co., manufacturers of grain and russet leather, Danversport, Mass., with salesrooms at 49 High street, Boston, and was a very creditable production in the finish.

During the closing days of the encampment a quartette of Peabody comrades, viz: Samuel G. Southwick, A. D. Gray, G. E. Wason and John Humphrey, under the direction of Comrade Southwick, made a flying visit to the World's Fair City. Their first point of attack was the REVIEW office, where they captured a former comrade of Post 50, but who deserted and came West twenty years ago. Together they visited many prominent points of interest, among which were Jackson and Lincoln Parks, Chamber of Commerce, The Auditorium and tower, Grand Pacific and Palmer, the Union Stock Yards and Libby Prison, wherein Comrade Southwick was a five months' prisoner, winding up with a delightful steamboat excursion on the bosom of Lake Michigan. The party left last Saturday for the East, much pleased with their first visit to the most wonderful city on the American continent. Their numerous friends among the leather workers at Peabody on their return will listen with bulging eyes and rapt attention to their tales of hair-breadth escapes from the scalping knife and tomahawk of the wily savage, and the lasso of the cowboys during their brief visit among "the untutored denizens of the west." Shoe and Leather Review.

Conflict Between the Government and Rebel Troops at Quintero, Chili.

Despatches received at Washington this week, state that a severe conflict occurred on Tuesday, between the Balmacedan and Congressional forces at Quintero, Chili in which the rebels lost about 3000; which is doubtless an exaggeration.

The insurgents succeeded in landing 10,000 soldiers at the Bay of Quintero, north of Valpariso, whence they were marched, along the shore, under cover of the guns of the six men-of-war, and numerous transports and other flotilla in hope of surprising the city of Valpariso by a rear attack.

The government forces were quickly on the move, and 5000 men were detached to check the advance of the rebels. At the Aconcagua river, the detachment delayed the crossing of the insurgent forces, near its mouth, while a force was sent by rail to protect the city, amounting to about 15,000. For forty hours the insurgents were held in check, during which time they sustained heavy losses, estimated at about 3000 men, and by the delay the government forces were enabled to secure the point of vantage and dispose 12,000 men in position to hold the situation. The Balmacedan forces lost nearly half the 5000 that were stationed at the river.

The rebel fleet was kept at bay by the galling fire of the Andree and thus prevented rendering the expected protection to the land forces.

Despatches to the Chilean legations at London and Paris confirm the Washington despatches. It is expected a decisive conflict will soon take place.

WEDDING BELLS.

On Tuesday morning at 11 o'clock at the residence of the bride's parents at Salem, Miss Mary E. Walton, formerly a teacher in the Wallis school of this town, was united in marriage to Albert F. Beckett, janitor of the same school, of this town, by Rev. J. W. Hudson. The wedding was a quiet affair, being performed in the presence of the immediate relatives and very near friends.

On Thursday morning at 7.30 o'clock, Rev. Father Masterson performed the marriage ceremony which united Mr. Timothy McGuire of Marblehead, and Miss Katie McCarthy of this town at St. John's church. The bridesmaid was Miss Mary Wallace. After the ceremony the couple left for Bath, Me., to enjoy the "Honey moon." Among the numerous wedding gifts was a picture painted by Mrs. Daniel P. McCarthy, a sister-in-law of the bride.

On Wednesday evening Mr. Harry P. Hutchinson was united in marriage to Miss Ella C. Sanger, at the residence of the bride's parents on Wallis street by Rev. Mr. Reynolds of the Baptist church. A small party, consisting of the near relatives of the contracting parties were present. Miss Catherine Wetherbee of Rockport and Miss Grace Hayes of this town were the bridesmaids and Joseph J. Thorndike and Frank A. Poor were groomsmen. During the ceremony, about thirty members of the Wright tennis club, of which the contracting parties were members, assembled in front of the house and decorated the carriage which was in waiting with slippers and other wedding ornaments. After the arrival of the happy pair at their new home on Jacobs street, the wielders of the racket reassembled and gave a serenade, after which they were invited inside and spent a pleasant hour. On Thursday morning the twain started upon a wedding tour.

At St. John's church on Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock, Charles Doherty of Boston, was united in marriage to Miss Lizzie Agnes, daughter of Mr. P. Roger Gill, the well known morocco manufacturer of this town. The bride was attired in a highly becoming white bridal costume of silk, while Miss Sarah Houghton, the bridesmaid, was also dressed in white. The ceremonies were conducted by Rev. Father Masterson. As the bridal party approached the altar to take sacred vows, sweet strains of Lohengrin's bridal chorus, filled the lofty arches of the cathedral, and at the close of the service, Mendelssohn's wedding march was rendered by the presiding organist, Miss Kate Linehan. At the offertory, a vocal solo was rendered with charming effect by Miss Alice Ducey. The church was well filled with the many friends of the bride. After the ceremonies at the church, a reception was tendered, to a large number of friends and acquaintances at the residence of the bride's parents. A large number of ornate and costly presents were tendered the newly wedded twain and the best wishes of a large circle of friends went with them on their wedding tour. They will reside in the Charlestown district.

LOCAL LINES.

A ball game will be played this afternoon the Peabody High school nine and the Lincolns of Salem. Game will be called at 3.30 o'clock on Square field.

Mrs. Lucy F. Dalton mother of Sepharino M. Dalton died at the residence of the latter, on Summer street, Thursday afternoon at the age of 86 years 3 months.

Work of grading the rails upon the Essex road upon Oakland street is nearly completed, and the road has been paved between the rails. It is a great improvement.

Miss Agnes Osborne of this town was one of the party that occupied the Langdon House wagon in the Mt. Washington coaching parade this week. Ralph her brother officiated as bugler.

Wm. Penn Hussey has been awarded the contract for coal at the almshouse sheds, by the overseers of the poor. His price was a few cents under W. Pickering & Co. of Salem, the next lowest bidders.

Plans for the new parochial school are in the hands of builders for estimates of cost. It is expected a school will shortly be built upon land, contiguous to St. John's church. Funds have been collecting for some time past.

Last Saturday afternoon a tournament was played on the Wright Tennis Court, which was participated in by several out-of-town players. Club prizes were awarded. Consolation prizes could not be awarded as the games have not been played off.

An Essex County Baptist Teachers' Institute will be held with Baptist church on Tuesday afternoon and evening, Sep. 1, commencing at 2.30 o'clock. The topics are: Illustrated Talks; The Workers' Difficulties; Normal Classes, and the Suncay School lesson for Sept. 6.

Lawrence Mahoney whom the police have been a long time shadowing was before court on Monday afternoon, charged with having liquor in his possession with intent to sell and keeping a liquor nuisance. He pleaded guilty and appealed from the sentence which was three months and $100.00.

The Electric Light Committee organized Monday evening, H. P. Reed, chairman; C. C. Dodge, secretary. The committee would like to ascertain how many incandescent lights would be taken by private parties before reporting, as they do not intend to recommend a commercial plant if such does not appear likely to pay.

The picnic of the F. M. C. T. A. society at Oak Island Grove, Saturday, was attended by about 500 people. On the one mile run Bennett won the first prize and Hamilton the second. Murray took first in the 100-yards dash and Butler second. The society's baseball nine defeated their namesakes of Lynn by a score of 10 to 7 for a purse of $5.

A match pedler worked a neat scheme in town about two weeks ago, selling Diamond point matches, for 75 cents per gross, and delivering about a quarter of a gross in lieu of the quantity represented. He introduced himself by representations that he was giving away beautiful calendars, which his phrchsers have never seen. This week he worked the same dodge in Beverly.

John A. Duggan, Jr., of Quincy, Mass., has threatened the electric street railroads using V shaped supports upon trolley wire arms for guard wires, with suits for patent royalties, demanding five dollars for each V used. The claims will probably be resisted upon several grounds, but mainly upon the ground that the device was in use for some years before the date of his invention.

A number of the musical people of this town intend visiting Worcester during the Musical Festival, Sept. 21, 22, 23, 24 and 25. Season tickets, admitting to all performances, including concerts, with reserved seats at concerts are $6.00. Single admission, reserved seats to concerts, $1.00. Organ, harp and song recital, 75 cents and rehearsals 50 cents. The arrangement of performances is as follows: Monday morning, afternoon and evening, and Tuesday morning in rehearsals. Tuesday afternoon organ, harp and song recital. The first concert will be Tuesday evening—Buck's Dramatic Oratorio, Arinnius; second concert will be given Wednesday afternoon, followed in the evening by the third. Thursday morning, the choral, orchestral, soloists and organ will fill the programme. The seventh concert will be given Friday evening, comprising Handel's oratorio "Israel in Egypt."

A new 45 horse Rae motor has arrived for the Essex road. It will be mounted on car No 11, and besides regular trips will be used in times of heavy travel as a tow.

A new brick factory has been erected by Newell & Knowlton on North Central street and they will soon remove their entire Liberty street plant to the new quarters. The firm is doing a large and constantly increasing business in extracting grease, which has necessitated larger and more convenient buildings. A spring upon the premises will supply all the water necessary for the business. It has been walled up, forming a large reservoir.

A drunken row disturbed the midnight air of Fulton street last Saturday. Mr. Murphy was badly injured in the melee and it was necessary to call in Dr. H. K. Foster, who found the man bleeding from a cut in the head, thought to have been made with a razor, and badly bruised. The police visited the house, but being a "family jar" no information could be obtained and no arrests were made. It was stated by the family that the unhappy victim fell upon a stove.

MY GHOSTLY COMPANION

"Come at once. Mr. Thomas Warrington is dangerously ill and wishes to see you."

This was a telegraphic message which I received one cold January morning about six years ago. Surprise was my chief feeling at the moment, for Mr. Thomas Warrington had never been more than a name to me, although he was my uncle. I had never seen him, and had never felt any particular desire to do so, not from any dislike or grudge I bore the old man, but simply because I had forgotten all about him.

Certainly he was my uncle, my father's elder brother, but for years before my father's death there had been a feud between them relating to a small estate which my father claimed, and which my uncle, though a rich man with much property, also claimed. A court of law settled the matter after much delay and anger on either side. My uncle was able to pay for expert counsel, my father was not, for, except this small estate which caused the quarrel, he had nothing but the precarious income of an author. My uncle fought hard, grasping old man that he was, and won his case. But this had all happened so long ago, in the days of my extreme youth, that I had never given a second thought, certainly never a serious one to the story. Hard words had passed between the brothers, I believe, very hard words, and my uncle had sworn loudly and deeply that he detested the sight of my father, and hoped never to set eyes on him or his again as long as he lived.

Perhaps you think it was unusual for a young man of no means never to give a second thought to an uncle who was the possessor of money and lands, but it really is a fact, and although my uncle was rich and childless, I knew that he detested me and my connections, and his estate was unentailed. I myself was a very young barrister, with enough to think about, and, up to the present, as much as I could do to get through my examinations.

Some friends of mine were talking the other day about strange things which had happened to them, and it set me thinking about the only really strange thing that ever happened to me, and I record the circumstances, hoping that some reader may be able to afford me an explanation.

Well, to go back to the telegram. I was certainly very much surprised, and for a minute or two stood staring at the slip of pink paper in an absent minded sort of way. Then it occurred to me that I was wasting time. The telegram demanded my presence, and I had no time to waste. I looked at my Bradshaw, found that I had an hour before the next train started, so ate my breakfast calmly, and packed a portmanteau, feeling glad for the first time since I had become a full blown barrister that no pressure of work detained me in town.

I soon found a corner seat in a smoking carriage, and resigned myself to a fairly long journey on this cold January day. I had taken my place in very good time, so amused myself by watching the people hurrying to and fro, and was a good deal attracted by a white haired old gentleman who slowly passed backward and forward at short intervals before the carriage in which I sat, and who, every time he passed, seemed to look at me with a far away expression in his eyes. I was beginning to feel interested in the old fellow, when the train started, and I soon forgot all about him.

By bad luck the train which I had managed to catch was a terribly slow one, which stopped at almost every station big and small, and I was surprised always to see the same white haired old gentleman passing to and fro on the platform every time we stopped. He never passed without looking at me with the same faraway expression in his eyes. At the first few stations I scarcely noticed him, but after a bit I began to wonder who he was and why he paraded about in that manner, and took a sort of lazy interest in him, pitying the poor old fellow for having to travel on such a bleak day.

The journey was certainly a tedious one, but I found a good deal to occupy my thoughts—my uncle, whom I had never seen; the old quarrel; the chances of his relenting in the matter of my father's estate; for surely he would not summon me from London for no other purpose than that I might make personal inquiries as to his health.

The day wore on, and the short winter afternoon began to close in. We had passed most of the larger and busier towns, and were coming to villages and small stations. All my fellow travelers had left the carriage, being mostly business men they had reached their several destinations in the larger towns, and I sat alone in my corner, when the old white haired gentleman, whom I was beginning to look upon as rather eccentric, turned the handle of the carriage door, came in, and sat down in the corner opposite to me. He said not a word, but gazed out at the landscape in a dreamy manner, while I took the opportunity to examine his appearance more closely. He was tall, thin and looked emaciated, with clearly cut features of a waxen color, and wonderfully blue eyes. He wore an old fashioned, low crowned silk hat, and a long, thick coat with a fur collar. The expression of his face reminded me of some one, but I could not remember of whom. I did not notice all this at once, for I did not like to stare too long at the old gentleman, but I need not have troubled myself, for he never turned his eyes from the window.

The evening drew on, the daylight faded and the lamps were lighted, and still he kept his eyes fixed and gazed out of the window into the darkness, while the dim light of the oil lamp shone down on his pale features, and I smoked hard and said nothing.

I think I must have dozed for a little while, then I heard the guard calling "Ashbridge road! Ashbridge road!" and I started up, grabbed at my portmanteau and prepared to get out of the carriage, for I had reached my destination; but my companion also rose, turned and looked me full in the face with a look which seemed to make my blood grow chilly, stepped out before me and I followed.

The station was certainly very badly lighted and the night was pitch dark, but I was rather surprised when I got outside neither to see nor hear any sign or sound of my fellow passenger. However, I thought it did not matter to me where he had gone, so finding a carriage awaiting me I got in and in the rush of other thoughts I soon forgot him.

"How is Mr. Warrington by this time?" I asked the coachman.

"He died this morning, sir," was the reply. And then followed the details of his illness and death, which lasted until we reached Ashford Hall, my uncle's house.

I rang the bell, and was soon admitted by a stout, comfortable looking woman, who showed me to my room, where I began to wonder what I had better do. It was rather an awkward position to come, a perfect stranger, at the bidding of another stranger, and find him dead on arrival.

At length I went down stairs, and the same kindly looking woman met me in the hall and gave me more details of my uncle's illness and his great desire to see me. Then she supposed that I should like to see the corpse, and so evidently expected me to answer in the affirmative that I did so, and she led the way up the broad staircase and down a long passage.

At the end of this passage she opened the door of a dimly lighted room and we entered, she carrying a candle. We went together to the bedside, and she, holding the candle high with one hand, gently lifted the sheet with the other and disclosed—the white, clear cut features of my traveling companion.

This was the first and last thing of the kind that ever happened to me, and is still unexplained.

I stayed on at Ashford Hall for the funeral, and found myself, on the reading of my uncle's will, sole heir to all his possessions.—True Flag.

A Negro's Terrible Revenge.

In Hayti and Martinique the venom of the terrible serpent indigenous to those islands, the formidable fer de lance, has been often employed by the negroes in disposing of their enemies. A horrible, but well authenticated instance of negro ingenuity and malevolence is told in Martinique. A huge negro, recently imported from the Guinea coast, had been whipped by the order of his master, one of the great planter princes of the island while it was under French rule. The victim made no complaint, but meditated revenge.

By long search he found the lair of a pair of serpents in the garden adjacent to the house. Watching his opportunity he killed one and dragged its body to the house through a window that was always open and into the bedroom of the beautiful daughter of the planter. He dragged it to the bed, lifted the coverings and coiled the reptile on the sheet. When this was done he carried the dead snake away and cast it into an adjacent stream.

As night approached the serpent's mate followed the trail, crept through the open window and to the bed of the planter's daughter. The latter, half awake, made a motion to brush away the intruder. Instantly the fangs were buried in her neck, and in a few hours she was a corpse.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Early French Playing Cards.

The French are believed to be the first people in Europe to use playing cards, and, as first made, cards were supposed to represent the different classes of persons in the kingdom. The hearts were the "choir men," or ecclesiastics, and early cards of this suit have a cope which, in form, somewhat resembles a heart. The figure by us called a spade was originally a pike head, and typified the nobility and soldiery; the artisans were represented by a stone tile, now known as diamond, while the farmers were symbolized by the trefoil or clover leaf, by us called a club.

The four kings were originally David, Alexander, Caesar and Charlemagne, representing the four great monarchies, while the queens were Argine, Esther, Judith and Pallas, typical of birth, piety, fortitude and wisdom, Argine being an anagram for Regina. The knaves were either knights or servants to knights, but which is uncertain, though the former conjecture is the more probable, from the fact that on cards of an early date appear the names of famous knights.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Rome's Artistic Degeneracy.

The Rome of 1870 was dirty but dignified; inconvenient for people with modern tastes, but most comfortable for those who had adapted themselves to its medieval ways. The Rome of 1890 is comfortable for nobody; the acres of new palaces that were to be are mainly huge, ugly tenement houses, stuccoed flimsies, abhorrent without and inhospitable within—a tasteless waste, where the highest virtue is fragility and the noblest destiny demolition. The transformation of Rome during the past twenty years is unique in the history of civilization for barbarism, extravagance and corruption; never since the world began was so much money spent to do so much evil.—Atlantic.

Walking Leaves and Twigs.

The walking and climbing leaves of Australia were for over half a century considered the greatest of natural wonders. A party of sailors wandered inland and sat down to rest under a tree. A great wind shook to earth several dead and brown leaves. These presently began to show signs of life and crawl toward the trunk, which they ascended, and attached themselves to their respective twigs.

Hence the sailors, who promptly ran away, said the place was bewitched. But the simple fact turned out to be that the so called "leaves" were really leaf shaped insects, having long, pendulous legs, which could be folded out of sight, and possessing the chameleon like power of varying their color to correspond with that of the foliage they are clinging to. Upon being shaken to the ground, instinct taught them to seek shelter of the friendly leaves again as soon as possible.

These walking leaves are frequently found in the woods of Illinois. The farmers call them "animated twigs," as they exactly resemble a bit of the tree. They are green when the trees are green, but as soon as the foliage changes they become brown. The writer of this was sitting under a tree reading in the woods of southern Illinois when one of these "twigs," as it was supposed to be, dropped on the page. It moved and thus revealed its identity. Its nature seemed to be that of a worm, and its vitality that of a very lowest. It died as soon as removed, and served as a bookmark for many years.—Detroit Free Press.

A Cheeky Man.

The cheekiest man of the season has been found. He entered a local barber shop not far from the city hall and asked if he might wash his face. The tonsorial juggler said, "Of course."

"I'd like a clean towel, if you please," said the stranger suavely.

One could have heard a pin drop as the barber acquiesced and handed him a clean towel.

"May I brush my hair?" said the fastidious caller, as he stepped toward a looking glass. The barber left his customer and pinched himself to see if he was really alive.

"I have a good, clear glass here. Now, just a little oil for my hair. There!" said the stranger, as he rolled Corinthian bangs on his marble-white brow.

The barber opened his mouth wider.

"Now, just a little wax on my mustache," said the visitor. He suited the action to the word and twisted the ends of his mustache to his satisfaction.

"I am much obliged, sir," said the extra nice stranger, as he adjusted his hat, strolled to the door and disappeared.

A liberal fanning and application of cool water relieved the proprietor, but it was an hour or two before he fully recovered.—Manchester Union.

Antiquity of the Domesticated Horse.

The horse was probably first domesticated on the plains of Central Asia. This must have been at a very remote period, for on the sculptured monuments of ancient Assyria we find highbred, carefully caparisoned steeds given in admirable outline, showing how familiar and how favorite an object the horse must have been to the Assyrians. The mane is long and flowing or curled or in tassels. Three horses abreast drew the chariot in which were three warriors. Saddle horses led by grooms or bearing horsemen are delineated, sometimes in the thick of battle.

The horse was doubtless introduced into Egypt as late as the time of Hyksos, and sculptured representations of it are often conventional types peculiar to later Egyptian art. Instead of the life and energy displayed by the Assyrian horse, there is a rather weak attempt to represent life and energy and the effect produced is mechanical. Probably the horse of the Delta did not compare in beauty or speed with the Assyrian horse. Berjean says he was more like the Dutch horse of our day.—Caroline K. Sherman in Chicago Herald.

He Got the Seat.

A nice young man got into a tram car a few evenings ago, and saw to his delight the only vacant seat was by the side of a young lady acquaintance. He made for that seat with joyous strides, and her eyes answered his with delighted looks. But just as he got there an elderly party walked up and dropped into the coveted seat. The young man approached more slowly and accosted the young lady.

"How is your brother?" he asked; "is he able to get out?"

"Oh, yes!" she answered.

"Will he be very badly marked?" he continued, and the old gentleman grew suddenly interested.

"Oh, no!" she said, "with the exception of a few marks on his forehead."

"Were you not afraid of taking it?" the young man continued, while the old gentleman broke out in a cold perspiration.

"Not at all," she replied; "I had been vaccinated, you know."

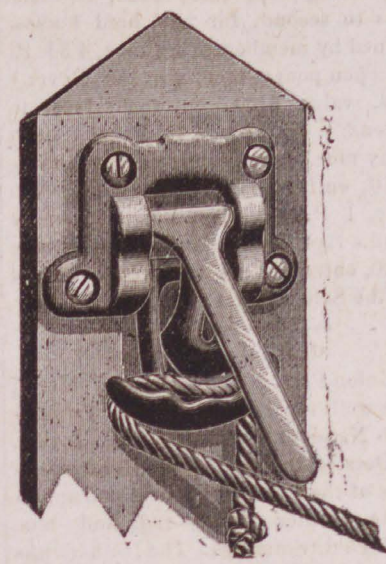

The seat was vacated instantly, the two innocent young hearts beat as half a dozen, and the prattle of "nice talk" strewed that part of the car, while an old gentleman scowled upon them from the distant corner.—London Tit-Bits.

The Cavalry of the Romans.

Devoted as the Romans were to war, the cavalry was an important part of the army. A great deal of adverse criticism has been passed upon their horsemanship and skill in managing the cavalry. The Prussian hussar officer, Warnering, pronounces Caesar an indifferent cavalry general and ridicules his arrangements where cavalry are concerned. Caesar, however, conquered all the same. His famous horse, credited with having a human fore foot, was equal to the star eyed goddess herself for victory.—Chicago Herald.

An Odd Use for the Pin.

An odd use that the pin was put to long ago was that of checking the temperate habits of the English. St. Dunstan conceived the idea of dividing the tankards out of which the liquor was drunk into eight equal parts, each part marked with a silver pin. The cups were generous affairs, holding two quarts. Consequently the quantity from pin to pin was half a pint, and the regulation was that the drinker "stop at a pin."

Roisterers, however, prevented the purpose of good St. Dunstan and established the rule of "good fellowship," by which the drinker was to stop only at a pin. If he drank beyond he had to go on to the next mark. As it was difficult to stop exactly at a pin the vain efforts always excited much mirth, and the trial usually ended with the draining of the tankard.—Table Talk.

A Man Who Had Eighty Overcoats.

There are dozens of New Yorkers who have a passion for buying clothes, and they count their suits by the hundred.
Pierre Leclair has a great assortment of clothes, and so has A. M. Dodge, the latter probably having as varied a collection of garments as any gentleman in the city. None of the fashionable set has ever excelled the late W. K. Soutter in the size of his personal wardrobe. Mr.
Soutter was known to have had eighty overcoats.—New York Sun

Two Extreme Cases.

In refreshing contrast to the man who lost a day's work because he bumped his head while getting up in the morning and thought he might have a headache, if he didn't keep quiet, was a man up in Sprague's Mills, who fell as he was carrying a piece of timber about noon, but kept at work until time to go home at night, when he made the discovery that a bone in his leg was broken.—Lewiston Journal.

A MYSTERY EXPLAINED.

The papers contain frequent notices of rich, pretty and educated girls eloping with negroes, tramps and coachmen.
The well-known specialist, Dr. Franklin Miles, says all such girls are mere or less hysterical, nervous, very impulsive, unbalanced; usually subject to headache, neuralgia, sleeplessness, immoderate crying or laughing. These show a weak nervous system for which there is no remedy equal to Restorative Nervine.
Trial bottles and a fine book containing many marvelous cures, free at William T. Lee's, who also sells, and guarantees
Dr. Miles' celebrated New Heart Cure, the finest of heart tonics. Cures fluttering, short breath, etc.

A Japanese Use of the Ballot.

Suffrage in Japan has been put to a novel use. A village was harassed by a midnight robber whom no one could detect, so an ingenious inhabitant proposed that each villager should write the name of the man he suspected on a slip of paper and put it in a ballot box. On the votes being taken there were fifteen for one man and the rest were blanks. The robber was so astonished at the proceedings that he actually confessed his identity.—Irish Times.

THE OLD DRESS.

Mrs. Langdon had sent out cards of invitation to her "dear 500" friends for a grand ball at her elegant residence on Fifth avenue in honor of the entrance of her twin daughters into society.

They had just been graduated at some fashionable "finishing off" establishment, and their debut was intended to be a very magnificent affair.

Mrs. Gregory, husband and daughters were on the invited list. As the former and two latter sat in their parlor looking at the elegant cards, with the interesting subject under deep discussion, they were broken in upon by the entrance of Mr. Gregory, who looked harassed and weary.

"Papa!" cried Lena, the elder daughter, "see our invitations to Mrs. Lang-don's great ball," showing him the cards she held in her hand. "And there is the loveliest silk at Stewart's that I want to wear. Can I go and order it tomorrow?"
she pleaded, laying her white hand, flashing with jewels, on his arm, and looking up into his face.

"Haven't you any dresses to wear?" he asked somewhat moodily.

"A-plenty of old ones, which have already been worn and will not answer for this particular event," she returned.

"How much will it cost?" Mr. Gregory asked.

"Oh, perhaps a hundred and fifty," said Lena carelessly, with as little idea of the value of money as an unfledged bird.

Her father groaned and said something about "foolish extravagance," then drawing out his pocketbook slowly counted out the required sum and laid it on the table.

"How much do you want, Bertha," he asked, turning toward her.

"I don't think I want any, papa. I have a pretty dress, which will answer very nicely," she replied.

"You're a sensible girl, and the man that gets you for a wife will have some one to help him keep his head above water," said Mr. Gregory, as he left the room.

"What is the trouble with papa? What does make him talk so dolefully when he is asked for a little money?" said Lena.
"Any one would think he was a poor man."

"It is one of his money nervous spells;
he is always so afraid his business affairs won't come out just so straight;
then it is economy and retrenchment, or everything will drift to bankruptcy.
That is the way business men always talk till it has become quite an old story with me," said Mrs. Gregory, drawing a breath of relief.

"I don't think papa is trying to frighten us at all," said Bertha. "I think his business does really perplex him. I've noticed for a week that he looked pale and careworn and he said but little. I asked him yesterday if he was not well, and he said there were anxieties preying upon his mind."

"Was that the reason you didn't want a new ball dress?" asked Lena.

"Yes, I'd rather wear an old one than place papa to the expense of a new one now, while money is so hard to raise," replied Bertha.

"Really, Miss Bertha, you are becoming quite learned in financial affairs. I should think papa would give you the position of private counselor in his counting room. With your wise brain to aid him, he might sail through seas of trouble, dry shod," said Lena with sarcasm.

"Pray inform us how you came to know so much about monetary affairs, my daughter," said Mrs. Gregory.

THE CURRENT of popular sentiment may now be said to be strongly set for Charles H. Allen of Lowell.

Mr. Allen is a middle aged, clean, progressive Republican. He has had two terms in Congress, and declined a nomination for the third, when election would follow the nomination, as certainly as daylight follows the dawn. But Mr. Allen is not the man to cling with the grip of desperation to honors which he feels should be distributed among other good party workers, and this is one reason for the enthusiasm that is awakened by his name at the present time.

His congressional career has been a fitting climax to his earlier political life, and in the gubernatorial chair of the old Bay State we have every reason to expect a term of activity and usefulness, characterized by a degree of dignity appropriate to that exalted station.

As Governor of Massachusetts we may reasonably expect that Mr. Allen would ever be found at his post of duty, instead of running around the state to shake hands with men who might possibly be induced to vote for him for second term.

There is little doubt Mr. Allen will receive the unanimous nomination of the convention in September, and, after that, the party need have no fears.

WE LEARN that the committee appointed to report upon the subject of electric lighting are in doubt whether to recommend a provision for commercial lighting in addition to the street equipment.

If their fears lead to a recommendation for a purely municipal establishment, or even an arc lamp equipment alone, and the town should adopt the report without amendment, a serious loss and setback will be sustained from the outset and the town placed in a situation where incandescent service may become practically impossible.

This would be a mistake and would doubtless be as unsatisfactory to a large percentage of those who voted for a town plant at the special town meetings. Arc lamps are the proper thing for street lighting, but entirely out of place in the large majority of places where electric lights are desired by private parties.

If the town is not yet prepared to establish such a plant as will accommodate those citizens who desire to use electricity for lighting, it will be far better to wait until such time as it can be done.

As soon as a municipal light is established, the business of supplying private parties would become so unprofitable to the Salem company as to compel them to discontinue business in town, and thus the factories, workshops, stores and other places where it is desired would be doomed to continue the old-fashioned processes of illumination.

We hope that all intending to avail themselves of electric light will make known their wishes before it is too late, and it will be too late when the committee has made its report to the special town meeting, soon to be held.

IN THE last issue of the Danvers Mirror, an article appeared relating to the nomination for Senator from the fifth district, and an interview with Capt. Malcom Sillars regarding an item previously published in the Lynn column of the Boston Globe, to the effect that Capt. Sillars would be the Republican candidate this fall in opposition to D. N. Crowley of Danvers as the Democratic candidate. In the interview, Capt. Sillars is represented to have said: "It is just this way; if no Danvers Republican will go in for the nomination, I will shy my hat into the ring." When asked if Senator B. Frank Southwick desired a renomination, he said that gentleman told him he was in for it until the convention should say otherwise. He thought the Republicans would have to work to elect their candidate owing to the growing strength of the Democracy in the district.

There appears to be no good reason why Senator Southwick should be denied a renomination this fall. He was good enough for the Captain and the district a year ago, and certainly his record during the session shows nothing to lead his friends of last fall to reject him now. He has served on several of the most important committees with such credit as to attract the notice of the press. It is but recently the Lynn Item took occasion to make a favorable editorial comment upon his record last winter. The correspondent from Lynn of the Boston Traveller, too, occupied the valuable space of that paper to praise the work Mr. Southwick did last winter in the Senate.

It has always been a custom to extend the courtesy of a renomination to any representative to the several branches of the legislature when nothing has been done to forfeit that compliment, and to deprive the present incumbent of the privileges of custom after a year of faithful labor, would be the climax of ingratitude.

The convention will soon be held, and we have little doubt that when the decisive ballot has been taken, Mr. Southwick will be declared the nominee.

Captain Sillars is an active and valuable member of the party, and when Danvers' turn to receive the honors arrives, we know of no one we could support with more genuine jest than he, but this year we trust he will not try the hat shying feat.

ESSEX COUNTY.

Maud Sawyer, 15 years of age, was drowned in Flax pond, Lynn, Sunday afternoon. Her father, a harness maker, her mother and eight other children visited the shore of the pond to hold a basket picnic. Maud, went in wading, and in trying to secure a plank went over an embankment and under water. Her father not being a swimmer, could not reach her, and drowned before her parent's eyes.

Frank Butters of Lynn was robbed of a gold watch in that city, Saturday night in a liquor saloon.

The will of the late John B. Tolman of Lynn contains a number of public bequests. The Lynn hospital will receive $5000, and the Christian church $3000.

Martin Conley, 27 years old, was instantly killed on Saturday morning by a cave-in at a gravel pit, where he was at work. Conley was buried under six feet of debris, and when extricated was fearfully mangled.

Susan McCarthy has brought suit against Charles M. Coffin of Bradford in the sum of $5000, for breach of promise of marriage.

Daniel Jr., the eight year old son of Daniel Murphy of Lawrence, was drowned in Shanty Pond creek, Merrimac river, recently. A horse belonging to an unknown party swam out into the river at the same point and was drowned a few minutes before the Murphy boy met his end.

It is stated that a Lynn firm received last week an order for $32,000 worth of shoes, at from $1.60 to $2.50 a pair—said to be the largest single order ever received. The shoes are for the Western market.

W. H. Proctor of Swampscott, fish and game warden on the shore of Massachusetts, has been doing a lively business around Cape Cod this season. A few days since a seizure of 500 egg lobsters was made in Monomoy on the Cape, and these lobsters were transported to Provincetown and planted in waters there. These lobsters were about five inches in length, and were discovered in sunken cars off the shores of Monomoy, placed there by fishermen.

The startled Fawn, a Merrimac river steamer, narrowly escaped going over the falls at Lawrence, one night last week. While turning to make its moorings at the wharf, the tiller handle broke and she became unmanageable. Steamer Henrietta and many small boats took off the excited passengers and in five minutes after the last one had been rescued, the Startled Fawn sank to the bottom. She was built several years ago for the Paris Exposition. But for the coolness and self-possession of Capt. Spales, the disaster might have resulted in fearful loss of life.

District Officer John J. Sheehan of Salem, coming from Montreal, unfortunately left his coat behind in the Hotel Balmoral. He was obliged to pay $1.70 before he got it back again, 45 cents express, 75 cents to pass it through the customs, and 50 cents to Justice of the Peace to attest a statement under oath that he was a citizen of the United States and intended to remain one, which certificate was forwarded to Uncle Sam's officials on board.

The parade in Lynn on Labor Day promises to be a mammoth affair. It is announced that 10,000 men will be in line, but possibly the number will be less, unless spectators are included in the count. Mayor Fogg is to preside at the mass meeting on the Common.

Nehemiah Stone of Marblehead was seriously injured on Tuesday, by being struck by the pole of an ice wagon of which he was the driver. He was unconscious for some time, but Dr. Eveleigh found no bones broken, and it is hoped his injuries are not of a permanent character.

At a meeting of the shareholders of the Washington Mills company of Lawrence, it was unanimously voted to pay in new capital to the amount of $1,015,000 on or before Oct. 15. This will place the corporation on a good financial basis, with a large quick capital.

At a meeting of the Beverly school committee on Tuesday evening Miss Alice Butman was promoted from the primary to the intermediate grammar school in the Washington district. It was voted to extend the vacation of the school another week, opening Sept. 8.

Wm. S. Tobey, driver of Steamer No. 1 of Salem, while riding on one of the horses on Monday morning, was suddenly thrown off on Lafayette street near South bridge by the rearing of the horse which took fright at a passing load of hay. Mr. Tobey was picked up and it was found that he had cracked his left shoulder cap. He was taken to the hospital.

A Waltham cycle club passed through Salem on Sunday, on a hundred mile run. The wheelman took breakfast there and dinner at Newburyport, returning in time for supper in Salem. Many other cyclists dined at the Essex House.

The new electrical plant of the Gloucester Street Railway was given a trial on Sunday for the first time. The trial was very gratifying. The East Gloucester line was opened Thursday.

The committee of arrangement having the Essex county parade of Red Men in charge are meeting with great success; from present indications there will be fully 2000 Red Men in line in Haverhill on Sept. 3.

The Trustees of the Amesbury and Salisbury Agricultural society have decided to hold their fair at Armory building, Amesbury, Sept. 29 and 30 and Oct. 1. Premiums to the amount of $1200 will be awarded.

The house 22 Washington street, Beverly, owned by John B. Hill and occupied by Chas. S. Dow, took fire from a defective chimney on Monday night, and was damaged about $1000; insurance $800.

Police Officer Guy G. March of Haverhill and wife left Salisbury Beach on Monday in a dory, intending to be gone but a little while, but a fog soon set in, and great anxiety is felt as to their safety. They have three children, one only two years old. They may have been picked up by some passing vessel.

The new Peavey Block, on Monroe and Washington streets; Lynn, marks the spot where in that direction the fire of November 26, 1889, was checked. The building will be the largest in Lynn, covering about 18,000 square feet; five stories high, with 166 feet frontage on Monroe street and 141 on Washington street; valued at $155,000.

Thomas Chapman a 9 year old boy of one of Gloucester's policeman was drowned last Friday in Fresh Water Cove.

Chick Bros., of Haverhill, discharged all their International Union help on Saturday night on account of their inability to arrange a new price list. The old list expired July 1, since which time unsuccessful efforts have been made to fix upon a new one. The firm is willing to pay the old prices, but will not grant an increase, as asked for by the workmen. A portion of the force have gone to work at the old prices, and probably the rest will.

Dr. Kate C. Hurd of Baltimore, Md., is attending to the practice of her father, Dr. E. P. Hurd, during the absence of the latter in the west. Dr. Hurd, or "Dr. Katie," as her friends love to call her, is a bright and intelligent woman and physician, and one who is destined to make her mark in her beloved and honorable profession. Dr. Hurd is a native of this city, and Newburyport people may well feel proud of her excellent record.—Newburyport Herald.

When you want the best medicine ever made, use DANA'S SAPARILLA. It will cure you.

Obituary.

Mrs. Caroline P., wife of Congressman-elect Sherman Hoar, died early Monday morning. Mrs. Hoar was the oldest daughter of James B. Wood, and a life-long resident of Concord. She was married to Sherman Hoar about six years ago and two children survive her, the youngest, a little daughter, having been born about two weeks ago.

Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery will cure

It must be done through the blood—and the "Discovery" is the most potent blood-cleanser, strength-restorer, and flesh-builder that's known to medical science. The scrofulous affection of the lungs that's called Consumption, and every form of Scrofula and blood-taints, all yield to it. For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Bronchitis, Asthma, and all severe, lingering coughs, it's an unequalled remedy. It's the only one that's guaranteed. If it doesn't benefit or cure, in every case, you have your money back. Can anything else, at any price, be really as cheap? You pay only for value received. Something else, that pays the dealer better, may be offered as "just as good." Perhaps it is, for him, but it can't be, for you.

The Wrong Institution.

Lynn has a bit of excitement in the Poor department, caused by the commitment of Miss Nellie McLaughlin, a woman about 32 years old, to the Massachusetts School for Feeble-minded. The woman, though never married, is the mother of three children, and being poor and having no one who can look after her, has been in charge by the authorities and committed as stated above, without the advice and consent of the Overseers of the Poor, upon the certificate of a female physician, named Dr. Allen.

A representative of the Lynn Daily Press has been following up the case, and has visited the young woman at the institution, and obtained a copy of the questions and answers which formed the basis of her commitment. Nothing appears in the answers to interrogatories as published by the Press; that would indicate such feebleness of mind as to warrant the proceedings, unless a large per cent of women of poor parentage with meagre schooling could be considered fit candidates for the same establishment; and it is thought the quasi prisoner is thus confined solely to prevent wardness. But this institution where the woman has been shut is not intended as a reformatory, and if Dr. Fernald, the superintendent, learns upon investigation that the new charge is sent him solely for such a purpose, she will be speedily discharged.

The woman expressed deep grief at separation from her children and said she would willingly work to support them if she could obtain her liberty.

The Overseers of the Poor are busily engaged to secure the release of the woman. It is probable they will succeed in accomplishing their purpose.

The Wheelman.

The fifth edition of "The Wheelman's Hand Book of Essex County" edited and published by Geo. Chinn, 15 Vandewater street, New York, is received. It is an interesting and valuable pocket guide for wheelmen or other tourists, being arranged in a plain, easy manner for reference. It will help the uninitiated to find points of interest in the various cities and towns of historic Essex County. The fifth edition is a revision of former volumes and contains some later data.

HE PLAYED.
How a Disgraced Actor Got Even with the Great Hamlet.

Edwin Booth, despite his reputation for being cold and unapproachable, has a humorous side and can tell a funny story, even when it's on himself, with a solemnity that is refreshing.

A member of the tragedian's company relates the following: "He once told me about a western experience of his in the fifties. Booth was then the star of a certain stock company playing the California towns. It was rough out there then, and the same company did everything from 'Hamlet' to a song and dance—all at the same theater and often within the same week.

"In this company there was a young man of much histrionic talent, who, previous to the advent of Booth, played the leading roles, but who was thrown into the shade by the new star. Jealousy and hot words followed. The manager and the disappointed tragedian were continually at war over the distribution of parts.

"When the time for producing 'Hamlet' arrived it was found that the cast would necessarily muster into act every one from the ticket seller to the lamp man. The long suffering manager had resolved to punish the recalcitrant actor, and he was given the part of Guildenstern.

"There was some muttering, but all went well enough until the opening night. The house was filled. The scenery was crude, and for that matter so was the audience, but the applause was generous. Things reached a climax in the second scene of the third act, where Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are sent by the king to spy on the alleged madness of Hamlet.

"The usual futile endeavors to get any information out of the melancholy Dane were gone through with and then, of course, came Booth's powerful scene in which the musical instrument is introduced (the pipe on this occasion being a clumsy tin affair, painted to suit the aesthetic soul of the property man).

"The audience listened in breathless expectation, and the dialogue proceeded as follows: 'Hamlet—Will you play upon this pipe?'

'Guildenstern—My lord, I cannot. 'H—I pray you. 'G.—Believe me, I cannot. 'And here the proud Dane lifted himself erect, preparatory to hurling at Guildenstern that crescendo of mingled rage and scorn which begins with 'Tis as easy as lying, etc.' But the crescendo never came.

"Hamlet—I do beseech you. 'Guildenstern—Then I don't mind if I do. 'And seizing the obstreperous horn, he broke forth into a weird, unearthly strain of Yankee Doodle and what-not. 'I stood there dazed,' said Booth, 'for it seemed to me hours, trying to connect the lines or collect my thoughts so as to go on, but it was of no use, for the fiend with the horn kept right on with his refined torture, until at last, in sheer mercy, the curtain went down to rise no more that night.

"Mr.—was promptly dismissed, but he had had his revenge."—New York Recorder.

I WAS A FOOL.
Yes, they said I was a fool not to try Sulphur Bitters for Rheumatism, from which I had suffered over two years; but I had tried so many doctors and medicines without getting relief that I was discouraged, I am now on my fourth bottle and almost cured. I was a fool that I didn't try that wonderful remedy before.—C. G. Pratt, Manchester, N. H.

Why People Get Married.
Though it is very common to reproach old bachelors with their celibacy, and to pity old maids as if single blessedness were a misfortune, yet many married people have seen fit to offer apologies for having entered into what some profane wag has called the "holy bands of padlock." One man says he got married to get a housekeeper, another to get rid of bad company.

Many women declare they got married for the sake of a home; few acknowledge that their motive was to get a husband. Goethe averred that he got married in order to be "respectable." John Wilkes said he took a wife "to please his friend." Wycherly, who espoused his housemaid, said he did it to "spite his relations."

A widow who married a second husband said she wanted somebody to console with her for the loss of her first. Another, because she thought a wedding would "amuse the children." Another, to get rid of incessant importunity from a crowd of suitors.

Old maids who get married invariably assure their friends that they thought they could be "more useful" as wives than as spinsters. Nevertheless Quilp gives it as his opinion that nine-tenths of all persons who marry, whether widows or widowers, spinsters or bachelors, do so for the sake of—getting married.—London Tit-Bits.

RECREANT THOUGHTS.

Even as a captive bird, when free, Seeketh its former nest, So do my thoughts, dear one, to thee Fly back again to rest. Even as the bird finds nest bereft Of all that made it dear, They find thy heart hath little left To comfort or to cheer. They try to flee from storms that beat, They have no place to rest, And cry to thee, oh, death were sweet, If sheltered on thy breast. —Libbie C. Baer in Arkansas Traveler.

THE STONEBREAKER.

There was once in Japan—at a time so remote that savants hardly dare speak of it—a poor little stonebreaker who was employed upon the highways.

He worked upon the highways, while it was daylight, all the time, during all seasons, under the rain, the snow or the sun. He was always half dead with fatigue, three-quarters dead with hunger, and was not at all contented with his fate.

"Oh, how I would thank heaven," said he, "if I could one day be but rich enough to sleep the whole morning through and eat and drink my fill. It is said there exist people, blessed by fortune, who thus live in ease and comfort. Stretched upon thick mats before my door, my back covered with soft vestments of silk, I would make a siesta to be broken every quarter of an hour by a servant who should recall to me that I had nothing to do and that I could sleep without remorse."

An angel passing heard these words and smiled—"Thy prayer be granted, poor man," said he.

And suddenly the stonebreaker, enveloped in sumptuous vestments of silk, found himself stretched upon some thick mats, before the door of a splendid dwelling. He was no longer hungry or thirsty, no longer tired, and all this appeared to him as agreeable as it was surprising.

He tasted during a half hour unknown happiness, when the mikado chanced to pass. The mikado! That was no small matter! The mikado is the emperor of Japan and the emperor of Japan was, at that time, above all, the most powerful of the emperors of the orient.

Preceded by couriers the mikado was traveling for pleasure, surrounded by cavaliers all decorated and bedizened, like the grand Turk of Turkey, followed by famous warriors, escorted by musicians, accompanied by women the most beautiful in the world, who dozed in their silver howdahs perched upon white elephants.

The mikado reposed upon eider down in a palanquin of fine gold studded with precious stones. His prime minister had the unparalleled honor of holding above his head a great tinkling parasol all fringed with little bells.

The enriched stonebreaker followed with an envious eye the imperial cortege.

"I haven't gained much," he said to himself. "I am not much happier for the few paltry pleasures I am enabled to give myself. Oh, that I were the mikado! I would travel in grand state, lolling in a golden palanquin blazing with precious stones, attended by my prime minister holding a great glittering parasol over me, while my second minister should cool my face with a fan made of peacock's feathers. Ah! that I could be the mikado!"

"Your wish is granted," said the angel. And immediately he saw himself stretched in the palanquin of fine gold, starred with precious stones, and surrounded by his ministers, his warriors, his women and his slaves, who said to him in Japanese:

"Mikado, thou art superior to the sun—thou art eternal—thou art invincible. All that the spirit of man can conceive thou canst execute. Justice itself is subordinate to thy will, and God, trembling, awaits thy counsels."

And the stonebreaker said to himself, "Ah! happy day! now here are people who know my value."

The sun, which had been very fierce for some days, had parched the country. The route was dusty and his glare fatigued the eyes of the new-made mikado.

Addressing his minister who carried the tinkling parasol, he said:

"Make known to the sun that he troubles me. His familiarities displease me. Say to him that the grand emperor of Japan commands him to retire. Go!"

The prime minister confided to a chamberlain the honor of carrying the tinkling parasol and went away.

He returned presently with the greatest consternation written in his face.

"Great emperor! Sovereign of the gods and of man! It is past comprehension. The sun pretends not to hear and continues to shine on the road."

"Let him be punished."

"Certainly! His insolence merits it—but how shall I get at him to administer the punishment?"

"I am the equal of the gods—is it not so?"

"Assuredly, great mikado—the equal, to say the least."

"You told me but a moment since that nothing was impossible to me. You have lied to me—you have disobeyed me, or you have badly executed my orders. I give you five minutes in which to put out the sun, or ten in which to commit hari-kari. Go!"

The prime minister went away, but did not return.

The imperial stonebreaker was purple with rage.

"Upon my word! This is a fine position—this of emperor, when one is obliged to submit to the familiarities, the caprices, the brutalities of a moving planet. It is no use to deny it, the sun is more powerful than I. I would like to be the sun."

"You are the sun," said the angel.

And the little stonebreaker shone in the high heavens, all radiant, all flaming. He took pleasure in scorching the trees, in drying up the rivers and the springs, and in covering with sweat the august visages of emperors, no less than the dusty noses of the stonebreakers, his colleagues of the morning.

But a cloud came between the earth and him, and the cloud said:

"Halt there! my dear. No one can pass."

"By the moon! This is a little too much. A cloud, a poor little cloud, without form, calls me 'my dear' and bars the way! Clouds are more powerful than I. I will be a cloud or I shall burst with jealousy."

"Do not burst for so little," said the angel, always in attendance, "be a cloud, since you wish it." And the new cloud rested proudly, in his turn, between the earth and the resplendent sun.

Never in the memory of God had there fallen such showers. The transformed stonebreaker took pleasure in pouring rain and hail upon the earth in a fashion so terrible that trees fell down, finding only mud in which to fasten their roots. Under his aquatic rule of several hours streams became rivers, rivers became torrents, seas merged into one another and formidable waterspouts were everywhere.

A rock, meanwhile, held up his head in the storm. In face of all he remained impassive. Upon his flanks of granite the waves dashed, covering with froth the waterspouts breaking at his feet; and the thunder made him laugh each time that it tickled his sides.

"I am at my wits' ends," said the cloud. "This rock ignores my power. He resists me, and I envy him."

Said the angel, "Take his place, and let us see if you will at last be satisfied."

The transformed cloud at length felt at ease. Impervious, inaccessible, impassive, under the burning caresses of the sun and under the fury of the thunder, he believed himself master of the world.

But lo, at his feet a little soft hammering drew his attention. He leaned over and saw a poor creature, covered with rags—thin and pale as he himself had been in the time of his greatest misery—who, with a mallet in his hand, chipped the granite into pieces to repair the neighboring roadway.

"What is this? cried the superb rock, "a poor wretch, miserable as me and I cannot defend myself! I am profoundly humiliated. I am reduced to envying the state of this creature."

"Take his place," said the angel smiling.

And the insatiable personage became that which he was before—a poor little breaker of stones.

As in the past he worked upon the roads while there was light all the time, in all seasons, under the rain, the snow, or the sun.

He was always half dead from hunger, and three-quarters dead from fatigue—all of which did not hinder him from being perfectly contented with his lot.—Translated from the French of Ernest L'Epine by Laura Lyon White for Short Stories.

HEIGHT OF CRUELTY.

Nervous women seldom receive the sympathy they deserve. While often the picture of health, they are constantly ailing. To withhold sympathy from these unfortunates is the height of cruelty. They have a weak heart, causing the shortness of breath, fluttering, pain in side, weak and hungry spells, and finally swelling of ankles, oppression, choking, smothering and dropsy. Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure is just the thing for them. For their nervousness, headache, weakness, etc., his Restorative Nervine is unequalled. Fine treatise on "Heart and Nervous Diseases" and marvelous testimonials free. Sold and guaranteed by Wm. T. Lee.

The Maternal Instinct and Dogs.

Dog worship is, as has been said, a fashion. It is, for the most part, an imitation, a pretense, in the beginning at least, though it may become, often does become, sincere, serious to a degree, injurious after a long indulgence. Unnatural attachments, affections misdirected are likely to bring their own re-venge. They stray so far from fitness that they cannot return to the normal when they would, whatever the effort made. That dog worship is a fashion is shown by the fashionable women who regularly appear in the parks and public drives with tiny dogs on their laps or nestling against their bosoms.

Often these women are unmarried. They give to dogs the care, the tenderness, the devotion they would give to babies had they borne them. It is plainly the derangement and frustration of the maternal instinct, as is proved when they become mothers. Then they usually discard their four footed pets immediately and forget all about them.—Junius Henri Browne in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Unique Tea Service.

County Commissioner Tolman has an unique tea service. It includes not only the usual articles of a set—the tray, platter, butter dish, sugar bowl, cream pitcher, cup and saucer, but also a caster, supplied with the usual cruets—the whole made of wood. Two kinds of wood, black walnut and white wood, were employed in their manufacture, and the contrasted colors, which appear in even the covers of dishes and tops of cruets, have a beautiful effect. The whole service is as useful as any made of crockery, and was made by a skilled woodworker while confined in the county jail. He agreed to make them for Mr. Tolman if the latter would furnish the material.—Portland (Me.) Argus.

MY FAMILY DOCTOR

For the last two years has been Sulphur Bitters, and until I began using them in my family, we had more or less sickness, and our doctor's bill has been very large. Since we began their use, we have had no doctor to pay, and three dollars invested in Sulphur Bitters has kept health in our family.—E. Knott, Postmaster, Waverly, Iowa.

About Washing Flannels

Dr. A. N. Bell, Editor of the Sanitarian, New York, writes: "Pearline has gained special ascendancy in my household and in many others to my knowledge, for cleansing flannels. Your own directions for its use are those we abide by: 'Wash flannels by hand in lukewarm Pearline suds; rinse thoroughly in warm water; wring dry (by pressure through clothes wringer); pull and shake well; dry in warm temperature and they will keep soft without shrinking.'"

Danger As one wash is sufficient to ruin flannels, great care should be exercised as to the use of the many imitations which are being offered by unscrupulous grocers or peddlers. Pearline is never peddled.

The Best Remedy
In this world, says J. H. Hoffer of Syracuse, N. Y., is Pastor Koenig's Nerve Tonic, because my son who was partially paralyzed three years ago and attacked by fits, has not had any symptoms of them since he took one bottle of the remedy. I most heartily thank for it.

Nervous Prostration, Sleeplessness, and Weakness.

WEST BROMFORD, Quebec, Oct. 1, '90.

The Pastor Koenig's Nerve Tonic I ordered was for a young lady of my household, who was almost useless to herself and others, owing to nervous prostration, sleeplessness, weakness, etc. etc. She has been quite a change. The young person is much better, stronger, and less nervous. She will continue to use your medicine. I think it is very good.

OPTIMISM.

Were we to know what blessed rest awaits, impatient might we grow of flinty ways; The unveiled Light Eternity would only dazzle Earth focused eyes. Angels were no fit mates For mortal men. In love, not scorn, the Fates Have sealed our eyes, that our appointed days On earth well may be spent; and blame, not praise, Be theirs who—fond, rebellious, rash, ingrates—Chafe at the limits which are man's defense. Children, what manhood means we cannot know. And need not, if we could. To learn; to grow. By earthly joy, pain, labor, rest—through sense To blossom into soul—is given us breath. Who truly lives, nor dreads nor longs for death. —Ernest Hawthorn in London Spectator.

WANTED—A GOOD EATER

The advertisement read: "Wanted—Four young ladies. Must be fine looking and of engaging manners." I went. The establishment was an eating saloon. Over its door glaring fat letters of gold informed me and all passers by that it was a "Restaurant for Ladies and Gentlemen." Everything in it was brand new and quite tasteless—gaudy. A shiny, veneered partition to one side had another gold lettered sign glued to it, "Cash Department." Under this sign was a little window set upon a marble slab, and in the little window the face and shoulders of a man. The face was very red, very wrinkled and very fierce. The head to which the face belonged was very small, with scanty stiff black hair on end all over it. The shoulders upon which the head was set had a pigeon breasted trunk between them, and were very narrow and very sloping. As I came in the man put his little head out of his little window and looked eagerly and fiercely at me. I walked up to his window and told him why I came. He could see but the upper part of me. "Stand back," he said. I did so, and he looked me over.

"I want girls," he said; "but—can you eat?"

His question surprised me. Most girls can. I could. Just then I was very hungry. I was embarrassed, not by my ability to eat, but by his question. I hesitated.

"Can you eat—much?" Very fierce, indeed, did he look as he repeated and amended his question.

"Am I to eat here, sir?" I asked tremblingly.

"Eat? Of course!" said he. Now, I did not understand whether he wanted me to scrub the floors, wash the dishes, take the money or what, but I did understand, I thought, that he was speculating (with a view to economy) upon my ability and inclination to devour much or to live upon nothing. So, always truthful as I am, I answered, "I am a very small eater, sir."

"Won't do!" said he.

"Sir?" said I.

"Won't do! Don't suit!"

I was sorely disappointed. Tears came to my eyes. My eyelids and my lips, too, trembled.

"Don't cry—in here!" he said fiercely. "Don't cry! Sorry—very sorry—can't help it—don't suit—won't do!"

"Is my appearance not what you desire, sir?" I ventured to ask.

"Look well—you're a beauty—very sorry—can't engage you?"

Although I was somewhat doubtful of my rank as a beauty, I knew myself to be a passably good looking girl, and I readily forgave him his exaggeration; especially as I did not understand my beauty to be a bar to my engagement.

"My manners, sir," I said, "are good—engaging. If you could see me wait at table, say for one day, if that is what you want help for?"

"Wait at table—nothing! Got waiters—lots! Don't suit—won't do!"

"You doubt my ability to please? You judge of my usefulness or my manners without having had opportunity?"

"No, no, no! Manners charming! But you don't suit—won't do!"

Queer, I thought. You're a beauty! Manners charming! Don't suit and won't do. Why? Wherefore? Curiosity, as well as want, stimulated me to ask the fierce little man: "Why don't I suit you, sir?"

Then, fiercer than ever before, he said: "Don't bother—any more! Small eater—don't suit—won't do!" And he slammed a book upon his marble slab and moved away from his little window—to get rid of me.

I reflected that it might have been well for me to have asserted that I did not eat at all, but I was bright enough, even in that moment of disappointment and vexation, to appreciate that he would not have credited the statement. Then I was outraged by his assumption that I must be a glutton simply because of my claim to temperance and moderation in eating. Angered by this and by his unreasonable rebuffs, knowing he would hear me behind his gandy partition, I said while moving toward the door: "What meanness! If I had opportunity I would eat you out of house and home!"

"Hey? What's 'at?" he yelled, as he bounced back into his little window and stuck his fierce little head through it at me. "What's 'at? Eat house and home? Hey? Hey?" He looked so alarmingly fierce that, in fear that he might eat me, my progress to the door—and out—was very much accelerated.

But before I knew it he was at my side, on the adjoining sidewalk. He seized my hand, and half pulled, half coaxed me back again: "Come, girl! Please, girl—come in—come back—please, girl!"

In no time, before I could think or prevent it, he had me back into his place, and closed the door and had planted himself against it.

"House and home—you said, you—eat some one out—did you? Didn't you? Hey? Hey?" His fierceness seemed transformed to a triumphant intensity as he spoke and guarded the door against my escape.

When I could gather a sufficiency of my scattered wits together to do it, I replied defiantly: "I would! I said I would if you employed me!"

"Hey? Hey? You would? You would?"

"Yes, I would, I would!" Angrily and defiantly I said it.

Then he darted toward me: "I'll take you! You're engaged! D'ye hear? Hey? Hey?"

I was perplexed—stupefied. In my consternation I made a feeble effort to think or reason, out of the inscrutable, how my vicious promise to eat him out of house and home could determine this benign effect, my engagement. But the effort was vain. In my deranged condition I could only nod with my head. I accomplished that.

"Good! Good! All right! You're engaged! But, say, you lied; said you're a small eater. You did lie—did you?—didn't you?—hey? hey?"

"Oh," I answered, when I could catch my breath, "that was a joke."

"Joke? No joking—in business. Business is—business."

"Yes, sir," I said, "that is a maxim I have heard before, somewhere; and I shall not again forget it." Then, in a doubtful voice, and ready on the instant to recall it, for I was by no means certain I understood him, I added, "I will eat all you want me to."

"You will? Good! good! All I want—hey? hey?"

"I will," I answered placidly; for I was reassured.

"Good! good! You're engaged!" Then making another dart at me and ramming his hands deeply into his pockets, he continued, "How much—a week—hey? hey? how much?" After saying which he withdrew his hands with nothing in them.

"Now what, besides eating, do you desire that I should do sir?" I asked.

"Do? Eat! Nothing else! Eat—all day long—and deep into—the night."

"No waiting on the tables, no dish washing, no cleaning or scrub!"

"Nonsense! No! Got people for that—easy! Blamed hard though—get good-looking—girls to eat. Been fourteen—here 'smorning—all small eaters—you're first one—big eater! All you're engaged! Hey? hey? Are you?"

Now I began to have a glimmering of my importance. So animated, I asked: "How much do you pay, sir?"

"Pay you—mind! You're engaged!—pay you—four dollars—per week. You're engaged—are you? Hey? hey?"

"I am engaged to you, sir," I complacently replied, "if you will make it six."

"Too much. Can't do it. Four!"

"I had moved toward the door. He bounded to it, and again put his back against it."

"Stop! Stop!" he cried; "blamed hard. All right. Make it six."

"Six dollars a week, sir," I replied, "secures my services; to eat being my duty." Then, in view of the odd, the seemingly fabulous nature of this bargain, my caution, of which I possess a stock, prompted me to add, "If paid weekly and in advance."

"Advance? All right. You're engaged."

"And when, sir, if you please, am I to begin?"

"Now! Sit here—this window—I'll ring. Waiter comes. You order. Here's a bill of fare. You eat. Go out. Walk around a block. Come in. Order. Eat again. Go out—come in. Eat—keep it up."

He touched a bell, a waiter appeared, I ordered something and ate it. He—the fierce little proprietor of the restaurant—again retired behind his gaudy partition, and then his head and shoulders reappeared in the little window where they spent the day. During its course he, with my efficient aid, engaged (at four dollars a week and not paid in advance) three additional girls, who joined me in the arduous employment assigned me.

It was his plan to obtain customers for his restaurant; by demonstrating to the public that he did some business, he hoped to attract it and do more. He had opened the place just a week before I came, and had spent the week, as he afterward informed me, in devoting the contents of his little head to the elaboration of a plan to possess himself of the only thing lacking in the restaurant—custom.

He kept us four coming in, eating and going out. He had a friend and confidant a couple of blocks away, with whom he left an assortment of hats and wraps; we went there and changed our appearance between "eats." He enforced this routine: It was eat, go out, change costume, come in, eat, go out—all day and evening. It was a brilliant scheme of intricate conception and of masterful execution, but for all that it failed of its purpose. The sheriff closed us up in four weeks.

I did as I pleased, pretty much, while it lasted; only he stipulated that I should allow no love making on the part of the waiters. And I never did. But he made love to me, and I allowed that; for, in spite of his fierceness, he was a dear, soft hearted little fellow, who obliged and favored me in all I asked of him.

And that is how I—at least helped—eat a man out of house and home.—J. C. Lavalliere in Pittsburg Bulletin.

A PLACE OF SUICIDES.

BEAUTIFUL LOOKOUT HILL, MADE FAMOUS BY WASHINGTON.

A Spot in Brooklyn's Magnificent Park Where Despondent People Go to Commit Suicide—Memories That Cluster About the Neighborhood.

Most New Yorkers know very little of Lookout hill in Prospect park, Brooklyn, except that they occasionally see some mention of it in the newspapers. One Brooklynite who was asked for information about it the other day described it as a place where "fools from New York go to commit suicide sometimes."

This description of Lookout hill is hardly a fair one. It is true, however, that for some reason men who want to commit suicide do somehow manage very frequently to drift out to this part of Brooklyn's big park to carry out their intentions. But they don't all of them go from New York. There have been two suicides there by Brooklynites. The two that preceded these, however, were men from New York, and of the many prior to these Brooklyn may be charged with the most of them.

One stormy, snowy day a well dressed young man hired a cab in this city and was driven rapidly over the bridge to Brooklyn and out to Prospect park. When the cab reached the city line the young man got out and sent it back to New York. Then he went into a saloon near by. He left the saloon, entered the park, walked through the driving snow to the summit of Lookout hill and there shot himself.

A policeman heard the shot, and found the body of the suicide still warm, but he was dead. He had evidently intended that there should be nothing cheap or vulgar about the affair, for even the revolver used by him was of the most expensive pattern and make and had been bought new for the purpose. He was identified as a Columbia college student belonging to a New York family of excellent standing.

REMARKABLE IDENTIFICATION.

The suicide before this was also that of a New York man, and it attracted some little attention at the time by reason of the fact that there was a mix up about the identification of the body. This had lain on the hill so long before it was found that it could be identified only by the clothes on it and by the formation of the body. It was formally identified at the Brooklyn morgue the morning it was found as the body of a New York printer, who had, through despondency, taken his life.

This identification was made by two members of Typographical Union No. 6, who had known the man. Later that day the body was again identified as that of a barber doing business on Third avenue in this city, and this identification was finally found to be correct.

The most curious thing about this case was the physical likeness of the printer and the barber. The barber was deformed—that is, he had a club foot. The same was true of the printer, and it was the left foot that was deformed, as was the case with the barber. They were physically alike otherwise. Then the printer's friends identified the clothing, the shoes and the hat and even a knife that was in the pocket of the suicide.

But the printer wasn't dead. The writer knows that, for he reported the first identification for an afternoon paper; the second was made too late for notice that day, and in about a week afterward the printer brought suit against that paper for $20,000 damages for saying that he committed suicide. He didn't get the $20,000, but he did prove to the satisfaction of all that he was very much alive.

A HISTORIC PLACE.

But there have been any number of suicides on Lookout hill. Brooklynites are inclined to object to the use that is made of this picturesque spot, and as for the Prospect park police, they more than object. They constantly patrol the neighborhood of the hill, and any loiterer about there is sure to have a very careful eye kept upon him by the bluecoated guardians of the park.

Lookout hill is one of Prospect park's picturesque and historical spots. It is a high hill looking out over the big lake and the boulevard, and is heavily wooded. As a point from which to view the surrounding country it is unsurpassed. From its brow you can see for miles in all directions. Coney island, Manhattan beach, and even Far Rockaway, are visible to the naked eye. Flatbush and other towns nestling down among the trees, and the farms stretching out over the level country, present a fine scene at this season.

General Washington used this very hill to make observations from when he was holding Brooklyn and watching for the expected landing of Sir Henry Clinton on Long Island. It was from here that the American generals watched Clinton's movements when preparing for the disastrous battle of Long Island that resulted in the retreat of Washington to the heights above the Harlem and gave New York city into the hands of Sir Henry Clinton.

The tide of battle swept all around the hill and in the green field below it good blood stained the sward.

But times have changed. Battles are still fought in the field below Lookout hill—the sham battles of the Brooklyn militia. And the hill itself is no longer visited by great generals. Those who want to commit suicide go there instead. —New York Recorder.

How Dentists Acquire Skill.

The dental student studies as much chemistry, anatomy and physiology as do medical men, and also performs a great deal of work in the histological laboratory. He learns to fill teeth by taking a decayed molar, for example, that has been picked out. Carpets

— AND —

Rugs.

All shoppers will find our store stocked with a better variety than others in Essex county—The values and selections are also the best.

CARPETS—The law of supply and demand in carpets is our special study. From the best known manufacturers have come the styles and qualities that represent this present stock—the best we've ever laid claim to. Too much cannot be said of its general excellence. This constant mention of carpets resolves itself into having assortments large enough to meet every demand at prices so reasonable as to be within easy reach of all who have to buy. Amid the numerous claims of carpet dealers one fact stands out positive—we're doing the business. That's all we care to know about the general trade tendency. We gladly accept the responsibility of selling carpets that're newer and better and richer and more durable than the average. Anybody can dabble in carpets and claim impossible things. Almost nobody knows how to keep close step with designers and sell exclusive patterns for the cost of the ordinary.

RUGS—We have received the handsomest line of India rugs ever shown in Salem, and they are now in our carpet department for your examination, at prices which will surely meet your approval. Also examine our full line of Smyrna rugs in all the beautiful patterns.

WORLD'S FAIR NOTES.

Of the 106 counties in Kansas eighty-five have organized World's Fair associations for the purpose of raising their apportionment of the $100,000 which Kansas started out to provide for its representation at the Exposition. Twenty-two counties have already raised their full share.

Lieut. H. R. Lemly, the Special Commissioner of the Exposition at Columbia, writes that a typical orchestra from that country, consisting of ten musicians, playing their native instruments, which are unlike those of any other people, has been organized. It will appear at Chicago during the Exposition, in connection with the exhibit from the Republic of Columbia.

Chief Fearn has received a letter from Consul-General Frank Mason, at Frankfort-on-Main. He says he is collecting rare manuscripts in relation to the discovery of America and other valuable relics and will show them at the Exposition.

The Territorial convention of the Liberal party in Utah has voted to request the Legislature to appropriate not less than $100,000 for the Territory's representation at the Exposition. It is reported that the Democratic and Republican conventions are certain to take similar action.

The Art Department has issued a strong circular urging every architect in the United States to personally assist in an exhibit of American architecture. The manifesto says: "The membership of the American Institute of Architects includes all the well-known names, in different parts of the country, of men to whom the growth of American architecture, as distinguished from mere building and construction, is due, and of which they are today the honored representatives. It is through these men that the growth of fine architecture and of the professional and social status of its practitioners in this country during the last thirty years has been developed; and the influence of the work of the Institute on public-spirited laymen of artistic cultivation has been marked."

Lieut. W. E. Safford, U. S. N., Special Commissioner of the World's Fair to Peru and Bolivia, has secured for the Latin-American department of the Exposition five samples of the ceremonial dresses of the Jiberos and Zaparos Indians. One of the Jiberos costumes is reported to surpass any of the dresses of savage tribes, yet discovered, in gorgeous beauty and lovely contrasts of colors. The two Zaparos costumes are woven of human hair, and are ornamented with geometrical designs.

Letters received by the Latin-American Department of the Exposition indicate that Mexican women will take a prominent place at the World's Fair. The country has long been celebrated for the variety of needle-work made by drawing threads from linen, which is known as Mexican work. Although now so fashionable in newer portions of the world, the making of it is an ancient art in Old Mexico, and exquisite specimens of the lace-like work are to be found in the antique altar-cloths of the ruined missions. The women also do curious and beautiful embroidery in silver and gold, for the gorgeous sombrero, without which no Mexican horseman is perfectly equipped. Toluca women make by hand a peculiar kind of durable and pretty lace.

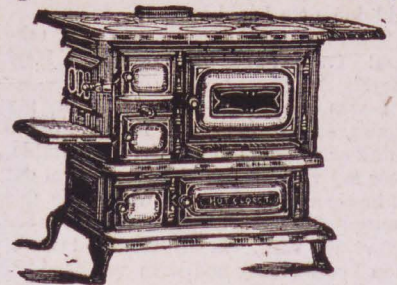

The effort to have a tribe of African pigmies exhibited at the Exposition is pretty certain to succeed. Tippoo Tib has given his consent and the consent of the King of Belgium, which also is necessary, can easily be obtained, it is believed, through the State Department.

The Very Reverend Doctor Peralta, Bishop of Panama, has tendered for exhibition at the World's Fair his very remarkable historical and ethnological collection which has been for some years in a museum connected with the bishop's palace. It is one of the most superb private collections of antiquities in the world, including ancient gold and silver ornaments, vessels and objects of worship exhumed from the tombs of the extinct race that once inhabited Columbia, rare vases, pottery and earthenware, rare ornaments, vessels and missals that date back to the time of the conquest, papers and manuscripts, and various other articles of historical interest. The offer has been accepted and the collection will be shown at Chicago.

The photographers of the country want a separate building at the Exposition, adapted to a magnificent photographic exhibit collected from the whole world. A committee has been appointed to confer with the Exposition officials upon the subject.

Arkansas, at the recent World's Fair convention, which was a very enthusiastic one, adopted a plan of the stock company order whereby it expects to raise $100,000 for its representation at the Fair.

Complete House Furnishing Emporium.

What is an Emporium? What goes into its make up? Why the term? The term at once suggests something large. A business conducted on an extensive scale. A mart of trade where everything of a special branch or several branches of a particular line are gathered together under one head. Such a combination properly managed affords at once immense advantages over single department stores. Advantages in the way of trading with one salesman. Buying your goods at one place. Quicker service. Contracting a single bill in place of three or four. And lower prices. ALWAYS from the fact that the items of expense in running such a store are made smaller in a dozen ways. Such is our Emporium, and its popularity is best attested by our constantly increasing trade. Remember that we have four floors fully stocked with as there are many lots that we wish to sell, both large and small, and which we have reduced in price, on purpose to clean out.

If you have any to buy, come and see us and let us quote our prices. We know something about the business, having had twenty-seven years experience—the best lighted Room Paper Hall in Essex County—and withal, Our Stock is certainly the best adapted for the popular needs of this section and our prices are as low, if not lower than elsewhere.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE.

Monday evening, the great curtain of the Grand Opera House rose upon the thrilling drama, Fabio Romani, which was greeted by a fair sized audience considering the high notch to which the mercury had climbed.

The play is the production of Aiden Benedict and Chas. W. Chase. It is a striking but perhaps somewhat overdrawn portrait of real life. The scene is laid in Naples at the time of the plague and subsequent eruption of Vesuvius, A. D. 1600. The main plot is a story of treachery. Fabio Romani, the last of an illustrious family, is stricken with the plague, and buried alive through the instrumentality of his trusted friend, who, with the faithless wife, desires to be rid of his presence. Fabio succeeds in bursting the bonds of his charnel house, and returns to the city to learn of the perfidy of his wife and friend, and from thence the play is a series of devices for wreaking sublime vengeance on the heads of the guilty. Signor Ferrari, his false friend, is drawn into a duel and falls by the hand of the avenger. Fabio then makes love to his wife, in disguise, and remarrying her, he then allures her to the tomb where he was buried, to see his hidden treasures. There the faithless wife goes mad and is borne away by her husband, just in time to escape the earthquake and shower of lava from Vesuvius' crater.

The scenery is of a high order of art, and the whole quite realistic.

Walter Lawrence, as Fabio, was greeted with immense applause.

Tonight is the last performance. Next week Henry Chanfrau will appear in "Kit."

TREMONT THEATRE.

Dockstader's Minstrels opened the season at the Tremont Monday evening, and afforded lots of fun for the audience. The entertainment was good as it always is. Their engagement closes to-night, and on Monday evening next, August 31st, Mr. George F. Marion will make his initial bow, as a star, before a Boston audience, presenting his original farce comedy entitled "Mr. Macaroni." Mr. Marion is well known, not alone here but all over the country, as a character actor and dialectician of rare merit. His original recitations—the Italian version of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus, and the George Washington cherry-tree story are excruciating bits of genuine humor. Mr. Marion's part in the new play will permit a display of his great versatility, making several distinct character changes, including a light comedy, eccentric, and two types of Italian character entirely new to the stage; also a strongly drawn negro part. Marion is one of the few comedians who does not force his humor in one's face. He has no need to do so. His humor is legitimate, and at the same time he is truly delightful in the most delicate touches of pathos. Manager Ludlow has shown excellent judgment in his selection of the company to support Mr. Marion. Those already engaged include Mr. Otis Harlan of Razzle Dazzle fame; Frank Opperman, a character actor of large experience; James Manning and Joseph Davis of the famous Silver Bell quartet; Donald Balfe, basso; George Preston, tenor, late of the Agnes Huntington Opera Company; Mr. Charles J. Clark, late with Hoyt and Thomas; Joseph Smith, son of the great Maitre de Ballet, George H. Smith, under whose direction all of the great productions from 1848 to 1882 at the old Bowery, the Broadway, Niblos and those of Boston Theatre and Philadelphia Academy of Music were made. Mr. Smith claims his son to be the greatest male premier ever seen in this country. Among the ladies are Miss Nera Vernon, a finished and capable actress of experience, possessing unusual vocal excellence; Lillian Harper, soubrette; Katharine Ormonde, contralto; Fanny Hart, Rhea and Leah Starr, etc. The costuming of the play will be elaborate, the music entirely new and of a bright and catchy nature. The general care with which the production will be made, leaves little doubt that Ludlow's players and "Mr. Macaroni" will be a success. Seats can now be obtained at the box office.

Richard Mansfield is rehearsing a new play called "Nero." It is said to suit Mr. Mansfield exactly.

John J. Ruddy has started to do the booming for "Hoss and Hoss," which will be done for the first time at Amsterdam, N. Y., August 24th.

Annie Pixley is not to act this season. She proposes to enjoy herself in Europe instead of going one-night stands.

Manager J. M. Hill of the Standard and Union Square Theatres, has been confined to his bed for more than a week, but is again promenading Broadway, as sound as ever.

Lizzie Evans and her manager, Charles E. Callahan, have parted company.

The much talked of Bowdoin Square Theatre, in Boston, is finally to be built on the old Maynard stables on the north-erly side of Court street.

Modjeska and Count Bozenta are at Cape May, N. J.

May Louise Aigen has written a play entitled "A Prisoner of War."

THE JUDGMENT.

Thou hast done evil
And given place to the devil;
Yet to cunningly thou concealest
The thing which thou feelest.
That no eye espieth it,
Satan himself denieth it.
Go where it chooseth thee,
There is none that accuseth thee;
Neither foe nor lover,
Will the wrong uncover;
The world's breath raiseth thee,
And thy own past praiseth thee.

Yet know thou this:
At quick of thy being
Is an eye, all seeing,
The snake's wit evadeth not;
The charmed lid persuadeth not;
So thoroughly it despatch
The thing thy hand prizeth,
Thou' the sun were thy clothing,
It should count thee for nothing.
Thine own eye divineth thee,
Thine own soul arraigneth thee;
God himself cannot shrive thee
Till that Judge forgive thee.

A MODERN GHOST.

Mr. and Mrs. John Lindsay sat together one winter evening in their cozy sitting room in their pleasant little house at Melrose Highlands.

"I should not be afraid of a ghost if I should see a live one," said John, putting down his evening paper.

"Why, ghosts never are alive, are they?" asked his wife.

"Well, that depends," answered John;
"there is an account of a meeting of the Psychical Society." He rattled his newspaper. "It seems from this that modern ghosts are pretty lively if not exactly alive. They don't go around with sheets over their heads and moan nowadays like old fashioned ghosts. They seem to have tasted of the spirit of progress of the age."

Dora was knitting a silk sock for her husband, and she asked him to hold up his slipper to let her judge the length of his foot.

"I should really like to see a ghost," said John, obeying his wife.

As he spoke, there was a loud ringing of the front door bell. It was one of the clapper bells with a gong attached to the inside of the door, and the ringing of this bell, twice repeated, was annoying.

"I wish folks wouldn't break the door down," growled John, rising to go to open it; "and I don't see why it is always the girl's night out." He went through the parlor, which was dimly lighted, and into the bright hall. Dora came out into the back of the hall where she could hear who came, yet be out of sight behind the jog of the wall where the hall wall made room for the sitting room door.

"Good evening," she heard John say, civilly.

"Is Mrs. Lindsay at home?" asked a strange voice—a man's voice.

"Yes," answered John. His questioning tone, his manner of waiting, indicated that he wished to know the stranger's business.

"It is a bitter cold night," said the stranger. "It is a cold winter we are having."

"Will you step in?" said John.

Dora drew back into the sitting room.
She heard her husband close the front door, open the register in the hall and give the visitor a chair. Now this is a wide, roomy place, in the modern fashion, more of a reception room than merely an entrance; but Dora did not quite like to have her husband seat there a visitor who had inquired for her. Besides, she wanted to see who it was. So she went out to the hall through the parlor and inquired, just before she stepped into the hall:

"Who was it came, John?"

Then seeing the visitor sitting by the register she said:

"Oh, excuse me; I'm sure I hope you will excuse me."

She was very much embarrassed by her own rush, for neither the stranger nor her husband even glanced at her, and Dora saw that her husband was paler than she had ever seen him. His gaze was fixed intently upon the stranger.

Dora could see nothing alarming in their visitor. He was a middle aged man, stout and tall, with dark hair sprinkled with gray. He wore a pair of sealskin gloves. The rest of his outfit looked comfortable and suitable for a sharp winter evening. The sealskin gloves looked unusually large. Dora stared at them with some curiosity as she advanced.

"Did you wish to see me, sir?" she asked.

The stranger looked at her.

"Yes," he said, "if you are Mrs. Lindsay."

"I am," said Dora with dignity.

"Will you ask your husband to step into some room out of hearing? My business is with you alone."

"My business is always my husband's.
No one can have any business with me which is not his," said Dora, moving to John's side, her nerves beginning to shiver a little at the visitor's manner.

"I prefer to step out of hearing, Dora," said John coldly, glancing at her now with an expression which both terrified and angered her, it was so unlike him.
Pride and fear struggled within her for an instant, then pride won.

"Very well," she said. "Go if you wish, John." He did not start.

"You perceive that he cannot," said the visitor. "I hypnotized him as he opened the door, and he is under the control of my will. I gave you a complete test at once of my power. You know that of his own will your husband would not leave you under these circumstances. He says he prefers to go because of my power."

"I am glad he is hypnotized then," said Dora with feeling. She slipped her hand into John's. "It makes me love you more to know that you would not go of your own free will," she whispered.

"Don't whisper to me!" said John Lindsay sharply in return.

Dora laughed.

"Now, how much do you want, or do want us to get up an exhibition for you or something? Mr.—Mr.—" she hesi-tated.

"My name is Connellton," said the stranger. "No, I do not want to get up

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1891.

THE NEW departure which the Boston Journal is about to make, in the increased size of the sheet, and the addition of all the improvements of modern journalism, is an event which is of considerable moment to the republican party. The Journal has always been a loyal representative of the party, but in a conservative way. And, furthermore, it has allowed itself to be trammelled by the size of its sheet, and has not catered to a class of people, in printing news, which this class desired to read.

There is not a more reliable, pushing bright set of news reporters on any journal in Boston than it has been the fortune of the Journal to have had on its staff for years. No paper has fewer changes, and no paper is better able to give the news, in an attractive, readable form than this paper. This we are assured it is the intention of the new management to do. It will compete directly in the line of news with the papers of larger circulation, and there is every reason to believe that it will be read by a constituency who will like it more the longer it is read. That constituency is what the republican party needs to reach. It needs to counteract the free trade heretics, the deliberate trustings and transformations, which are so plausibly but none the less untruthfully served up in the Herald and other papers. No paper can do this better than the Journal. The people who buy the paper for the news will read the editorial columns. They will find there material for thought. They will learn much that is reliable in the progress and trend of the republican party. And the eyes of the many readers will be opened. Success to the new departure. We hope to see it the foremost paper in Boston, in point of circulation, as it already is in purity of tone and ability in its editorial and reportorial utterances.

IT WILL be well for the republican party if the unity and harmony which prevails among the leaders can be continued to the local caucuses, not only for the election of delegates to the state convention, but to the local conventions as well. We are led to this remark by the proximity to the time when the caucuses will be held here, and hope that all republican citizens will take it upon themselves to attend the primaries, which are in a large sense, or should be, an earnest of the work which is to be done during the campaign.

The time for the gubernatorial convention is fast approaching, and when the Boston Herald notes particularly the feeling that it has found existing, all over the state, and calls it a singular state of things, there surely is something which must be worthy of consideration. It is so. By common consent, there are two candidates in the field—neither of them with headquarters or committees, but the supporters of each are only commendatory of Mr. Allen or Mr. Crapo so far as it seems to them for the best interest of the party, and each will work as heartily and unitedly for the support at the polls of whomsoever the convention shall designate.

It is no time to send pledged delegations. It is no time to set one man above another. It is the duty of the republicans of this town, of every town, to send broad, representative men to the convention. Not the representative of any former clique or ring or portion of the party, but men who will unite all differences, men who will grasp the situation at the convention, and can act as well as think. The republican party of every town contains such men, and the bright, progressive and aggressive young men in the party should not be forgotten. This is to be a stirring campaign. The republican party was never in a better condition, or has it for years been possessed of stronger material with which to wage an aggressive campaign than at the present time. Massachusetts is not a democratic state and Governor Russell was not elected by the democrats. The republicans who were dissatisfied with this, that and the other, who defeated one of the best republican governors Massachusetts has had for years, and the stay-at-home republicans, have had enough of their folly.

There is no call for discouragement or disheartenment on the part of the republicans. Governor Russell did not receive as many votes by many thousands, last year, as was given him the previous year when he was defeated. Under Mr. Allen or Mr. Crapo the party can win and will win this fall. Either of the candidates is a match for Governor Russell on the stump. Either is prepared to make a vigorous campaign, and while we are of the opinion that Mr. Allen will be the choice of the convention, we yield to no man in our appreciation of the ability of Mr. Crapo. He is a strong business man, and a splendid campaign orator, while Mr. Allen has the advantage of being a younger man.

There should be an immediate organization of the republican party of this town. The republican club should hold an early meeting, and aid the town committee this year as it has done before. No better work was ever done in Peabody than the year when both the town committee and the club worked in harmony, held frequent meetings and informal rallies and brought out a strong vote. Let it be done this year, and let this town be ranged on the republican side of the column as it can be with earnest and effective work.

ESSEX COUNTY.

Boxford's valuation is $704,143, of which $581,155 is in real estate, and the tax rate is $9.10.

Thomas Webb, dealer in groceries, Lawrence, has offered his creditors 25 cents on the dollar.

A wildcat was killed at East Gloucester on Tuesday after he had for several days been stealing chickens.

A notable gathering is promised at Manchester next Monday, when the reunion of Dea. Price's pupils is held.

Louis H. W. French, principal of the Sandwich high school, has been elected sub-master of the Lawrence high school.

Henry W. Wadham, the 10-year-old Marblehead boy charged with embezzling three letters, has been held in $300 for the U. S. Court.

Rockport's total valuation is $2,134,768, of which $1,803,917 is in real estate. The number of polls is 896. The rate of taxation is $15.70 per 1000.

About $8 in change was stolen from the money drawer of James O. Perry's provision store in Danvers, entrance being effected through a rear window.

Rev. R. R. Kendall has resigned his pastorate at Boxford, after eight years of acceptable service, and will become pastor of the First Congregational church in Weymouth, Oct. 1.

Miss Anna W. Devereux, teacher at the kindergarten school at Rehoboth building, Marblehead, has accepted the principalship of St. John's Kindergarten, Saginaw, Mich.

The stable of Joseph E. Foster, on Chapman street, Beverly, was burned on Tuesday evening and it is supposed the fire was of incendiary origin. A reward of $500 is offered by the Beverly authorities for the conviction of the perpetrator.

Messrs. H. O. Woodbury and Rufus H. Woodbury of Beverly were among the guests at the reception held in Reading on Saturday afternoon and evening, by Mr. and Mrs. Lewis, in recognition of her 50th birthday anniversary and his 33rd business anniversary.

William O. Tucker and William Goodwin of Marblehead, about 26 years old, started Aug. 18 in a dory for Isles of Shoals, and left Annisquam on the 20th, since which nothing has been heard from them, and it is feared misfortune has befallen them. Friends are intensely anxious.

The dedication of the remodeled church of the Baptist Society at Beverly Farms will occur on Thursday, Sept. 10. There will be a sermon by Rev. T. B. Johnson of the First church, Lynn, and on Sunday, Sept. 13, Rev. George E. Hoar of the Watchman will preach.

Rev. John L. Dearing and Mrs. Mary L. Dearing, the daughter of Rev. Henry Hinckley of Lynn, who have been on their wedding tour in Maine, have started for Japan via New York. Mr. Dearing goes out to engage in Missionary work. The couple go up the Hudson, thence to Niagara, and from there on the Canadian Pacific Railroad to Japan. They will take passage on the steamer Empress to Japan, sailing Sept. 9.

About 12 o'clock on Tuesday night Edward Carroll made a murderous assault upon Mrs. Flora E. Pressy at her home, 172 Merrimack street, Haverhill, with a revolver, the ball taking effect in her right shoulder. Mrs. Pressy let rooms to lodgers, and Carroll was turned away five weeks ago for non-payment of rent. Carroll stole into the house and fired at the woman through a door as she was sitting in a chair with her back toward him. Mrs. Pressy, who is 32 years, will probably recover, though the wound is dangerous. Carroll made his escape; he was drunk.

The tax rate in Newburyport will be $15.80 on $1000, an increase of $1 over last year.

Mrs. Hosmer of Lynn has been elected teacher of music in the public schools of Marblehead.

Among this week's patents are the following to Lynn parties: Norman C. Bassett, elevator controlling mechanism (two patents); Edgar Shaw, wrench; same, making wrenches; Elihu Thompson, electric motor; Chas. J. Van Depeole, closed conduit for electric railways; same, electric coal mining machine; same, system of electric railway conductors; same, circuit controller for electro-magnetic engines; same, system of supplying current to reciprocating electric engines; same, telpher system; same, electromagnet-reciprocating engine; same, combined electric engine and pump; and two other patents covering modifications of electric inventions previously patented by Mr. Van Depeole.

Manchester at its town meeting on Monday evening voted to accept the gift of H. L. Higginson of a strip of land at West Manchester to widen Bridge street, and $200 was appropriated to reduce the grade of Craft's hill from 10 feet in 100 to 7 feet in a 100 at a cost of $2000—$1000 to be contributed by Mr. Greeley Curtis for the purpose; and to authorize the town treasurer to hire a sum of money not exceeding $100,000 in anticipation of the water loan bonds.

At about 10.30 on Sunday night, a Mr. and Mrs. H. E. Atwood of Ayer Village were driving through the woods on a lonely road near Haverhill, they were "held up" by two men with drawn revolvers, who demanded their valuables. One of the men grabbed the bit and tried to hold the horse, while the other covered Mr. Atwood with a pistol. Mr. Atwood, however, defied the highwaymen and vigorously applied the whip to the horse. The animal became so lively that the man who was holding the horse was obliged to let go, and Mr. and Mrs. Atwood drove home at a rapid pace, and the highwaymen not using their pistols. Mr. Atwood had between $500 and $600 on his person, and was unarmed. Mrs. Atwood was overcome with fright and on Monday was prostrated.

The body of Mrs. Guy G. March was found at the south jetty below Newburyport on Sunday morning. It will be remembered that Officer March of Haverhill with his wife went out in a dory from Salisbury Beach, Aug. 23, and a heavy fog shut in shortly after, since which nothing has been heard from them. The boat went ashore on Saturday at Londoner's Island, Isle of Shoals and next morning the lady's body was discovered as above stated. Thus ends the suspense, rendering it certain that both were drowned. Mr. March was a member of the Knights of Pythias, and Mrs. March was a member of the Pythian sisterhood. They leave three children, aged two, six and nine years respectively, besides brothers and sisters. Recently Mrs. March fell heir to $6000, and she and her husband carried life insurance policies, so that children will be well provided for.

The Purest and Best

Articles known to medical science are used in preparing Hood's Sarsaparilla. Every ingredient is carefully selected, personally examined and only the best retained. The medicine is prepared under the supervision of thoroughly competent pharmacists, and every step in the manufacture is carefully watched with a view to securing in Hood's Sarsaparilla the best possible result.

His Best Girl Flirted.

Social circles in St. Paul, Minn. are on a broad smile over the remarkable suit brought by John W. Turner against Miss Ella Terwilliger, a pretty brunette of twenty summers. The suit is for $5000 damages, and the young man claims this amount on the ground that the young lady is a common flirt. Referring to his case, Mr. Turner said with great warmth:

"This is not a breach of promise case, but a case for damages. I don't like flirting, and I am going to show people that this country is a very unhealthy one for that kind of business. I have been fair with the girl. I told her that I detested flirting, and when I commenced keeping company with her I told her that I did it with the intention of marrying her, and had every reason to believe she intended to marry me. Now she has gone to flirting with other people, and I intend to punish her for it."

Were They Qualified?
A correspondent sends some evidence that it is not always the school children who have queer ideas regarding the meaning of words. She has transcribed from several hundred replies to questions given in the examination of applicants for the position of teacher. The candidates were asked to define plagiarism. Here are eight of the answers.
Plagiarism is the act of plaguing. It is the state of believing differently from the majority of people.
It is the act of telling falsehoods about an opponent. It is downright meanness.
It is having the disposition to fight. It is something made correct by usage. I do not know unless it relates to the power of witching.
Define pedagogics. Pedagogics is fe-mail teachers. It relates to petty rulers.
In that case there is something about pedagogics in the history of Europe, also history of the United States and the Bible. It is the history of one's good or bad deeds. Pedagogics is an old teacher that's cranky.
What are metaphoric rocks? They are rocks composed of little animals called metamorphoses.
What is the derivation of the word
"polypus"? It is derived from poly (many) and pus (puss); many cats.
What is anatomy? Anatomy is extinct in a dead body.
What can you say of the use of pain and pleasure? Pain is of no use, but it is bad for the health. Pain gives the physician practice. Pain tells us that all is not right in the region where the pain is. There are many kinds of pain, enough for every one to have some. Pleasure is useful because it promotes health, it lets us enjoy ourselves while the pains are absent.
Describe the bee. The bee has 2 wings body not the head that is poisonous.

He is classed among flies.

The Lumber Business of Three States.
The value of forest products, not manufactured at the mill, in Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota, 1890, aggregates
$30,426,194; value of mill products, $115,
699,004; value of remanufactures, $21, 112,618—making an aggregate value of products in three states of $167,237,816.
The capital invested to produce this value was $270,152,012; men employed in forests, 95,253; women, 99; children, 10; animals, 32,491. In the mills the product required the labor of 87,939 men, 646 women and 653 children.
The amount represented in operation of machinery and chemical appliances, 1890, was $23,559,534; the expenditure of steam and water power was reported as sufficient to lift 3,500,000 tons one foot in one minute; 1,262,151,180 cubic feet of merchantable timber were removed from natural growth; $7,890,254 were invested in vessels and other means of transport, and $99,688,256 were expended for wages, subsistence, supplies and miscellaneous purposes.
The aggregate increase of product since 1880 is reported to be 29.66 per cent.
in quantity and 75.92 per cent. in value.

I WAS A FOOL.
Yes, they said I was a fool not to try Sulphur Bitters for Rheumatism, from which I had suffered over two years; but I had tried so many doctors and medicines without getting relief that I was discouraged. I am now on my fourth bottle and almost cured. I was a fool before.—C. G. Pratt, Manchester, N. H.

Kind Words from an Angel.
It was evident that she scolded for the pleasure of scolding; to be disagreeable, as pretty women find a singular, rare, extraordinary diversion in being, once a month or a week or a day; for his replies to her reproaches were frank, earnest and flagrantly truthful. The majority in the car was for him, although a good advocate, who would have whispered to her to undo the knot of her brows, might still have made for her a triumph similar to that of Helena, daughter of Leda, in the Greek council.
Surely he suffered all the tortures of the abandoned; but there was an old woman in black in the car, and she must have been a fairy in disguise, she was so marvelously wrinkled and ugly.
She put her shriveled hand on the little gloved hand of his companion, and calmly, in a voice of the last century, a voice to sing to a clavier accompaniment, she said: "Madam, I had lovers once; and, peevish, I fancied I could never lose them. Now, I would be am-able to a man who loved me, even if he had, like my shawl, which is made of more holes than stuff, more faults than virtues. I would be amiable to him."—

FIGHTING GRIZZLIES.
EXPERIENCES OF A MINER IN THE JAWS OF AN ANGRY BEAR.

The Shaggy Monster Lacerated the Hunter
Most Frightfully and Then Watched Over the Body Until Satisfied That Life Was Extinct.

The name of a well known citizen of Humboldt county on the Russ House register a few days ago recalled to his friends the story of a desperate fight with grizzlies in the early days.
It was in the fall of 1851, and three starving men crawled through a thick growth of Humboldt county timber and found themselves facing eight monster grizzly bears. Goaded to desperation by hunger the men determined to attack the ferocious animals. The heart of Thomas Seabring failed as the little party drew near the bears, and he sought shelter by climbing a tree.

The other men, S. K. Wood and Isaac Wilson, threw prudence to the winds and advanced to within fifty yards of the bears. Wood fired his rifle and the nearest bear fell, biting and tearing the ground as though in the agonies of death.
While Wood was reloading his rifle
Wilson brought down a bear.
Five of the grizzlies retreated up a ravine, but one shaggy monster remained with her fallen companions. She sat erect on her haunches and turned her eyes on the men as if daring them to battle.

Wilson, awed by her aspect, ran for a tree, while Wood tried to reload his gun, but found himself unable to ram the ball down on the powder. While in this predicament the grizzly that had not fled rushed at him. Wood succeeded in getting into a small buckeye tree, and used his gun to beat the bear off as she attacked the tree with the intention of shaking him out.

IN THE JAWS OF A GRIZZLY.
While he was engaged in fighting off this bear, Wood, to his horror, saw the animal he had wounded rise and rush toward him. No blows that he could inflict on the wounded animal could check her. At the first spring she made the tree broke and the bears jumped for Wood. He gained his feet and made with all speed down the mountain, where another small tree stood about thirty yards away. He reached the tree with the wounded bear at his heels, and, seizing the trunk, he swung his body around so as to give the bear room to pass him, which she did, plunging headlong down
the mountain about twenty yards.

Before Wood could, with his failing strength, swing himself into the tree the second bear bounded up and seized his right ankle. By this time the wounded bear returned, and as Wood fell she snapped at his face. He dodged, and she caught his left shoulder.
Then commenced a terrific struggle.
The maddened animals tugged in opposite directions at Wood's ankle and shoulder, and he was in imminent danger of being torn to pieces. He fought as best he could, but each exertion he put forth only intensified the rage of the bears.
When he was almost fainting with pain the bear that had not been wounded dropped his ankle and trotted slowly after his companions up the ravine. Then the wounded bear let go her hold on his shoulder. Wood sank back on the ground, and lay perfectly quiet as though dead, hardly daring to breathe. The grizzly stood majestically over him, watching for the slightest movement, and snarling with rage. The pain that racked the man's frame was frightful, and he risked his life in an effort to assume an easier position.

RESCUED IN BAD SHAPE.
At the first movement the grizzly, roaring furiously, rushed at him. She shoved her nose close to his face and sniffed at him, but Wood was again motionless, and the bear, raising her head, gave vent to unearthly screams.
Wood, knowing that his life depended on it, remained motionless, and the bear trotted after her companions up the ravine.
When he attempted to rise Wood found that his right hip was dislocated and his left shoulder chewed to the bone, while his clothing had been stripped from his body and his flesh had been chewed in a hundred places. Inch by inch he painfully dragged himself from the spot, until Seabring and Wilson, accompanied by David A. Buck, the latter of whom had been left to guard the camp, found him and carried him to their quarters.

At this spot the party remained twelve days, subsisting on the meat of the bear that had been killed. They were lost in the mountains, but finally Wood, despite his agony, insisted upon being tied to a horse and accompanying his friends in search for a path to civilization. During the ten days that followed, every step of the horse that Wood rode caused unspeakable torture to the rider, but Wood bore it like a martyr, and an occasional groan was all the complaint that escaped his lips.

Finally they found a road out of the mountains and reached the farm of Mrs.
Mark West, thirty miles from Sonoma, where Wood was cared for, and in six weeks was able to join his friends in San Francisco.

The injuries inflicted by the grizzlies made Wood a cripple for life and eventually were the cause of his death, and it was his son who told of this fight with the grizzlies.—San Francisco Examiner.

MY FAMILY DOCTOR
For the last two years has been Sulphur Bitters, and until I began using them in my family, we had more or less sickness, and our doctor's bill has been very large.
Since we began their use, we have had no doctor to pay, and three dollars invested in Sulphur Bitters has kept health in our family.—E. Knott, Post-

Two Pretty Daughters of a Well Known Literary Man Help Their Father.

A well known literary man who had been the recipient of not a little attention during a brief stay in London, received not long ago a letter from one of his English friends announcing his arrival in America and proposing himself for a visit of a few hours, including one night. Although delighted at the prospect of seeing a man whom he much admired, Mr. L— was greatly puzzled in regard to the entertainment and accommodation of his visitor, as their modest household boasted of only one servant, and he wished to ask a few friends to meet the distinguished author at dinner.
His eldest daughters laughingly took matters in their own hands, telling him to invite the guests and they would "guarantee satisfaction." The shy recluse, having unbounded faith in his womankind, did as he was bidden, invited half a dozen close spirits to his little country house and retired to his den and his books with perfect equanimity.

"We make only one stipulation, papa," said the girl, "and that is that Meta (the third daughter) shall be the only one ready to receive your grand English friend, and that you will not mention the rest of us." Mr. L— readily agreed to everything, and, absorbed in his beloved books, was quite oblivious to all arrangements until Meta, looking as pretty as a picture, in the freshest of ginghams, announced that she was ready to drive him to the station to meet the honored guest. On their return with the stranger the door was opened by a tidy looking maid in the neatest of caps and aprons, at whom the old gentleman hardly glanced as he ushered his guest into the house, merely thinking that his daughters had picked up a rather nice looking girl.

The modest little guest room was most attractive with fresh muslin and bunches of roses, and fairly luxurious with ample and comfortable washing arrangements and abundant drapery.
The neat looking maid brought a can of hot water to the door and announced the dinner hour. "How delightful all this republican simplicity is, and how comfortable!" murmured the traveler to himself. "It is just as I imagined L—would live, and what a pretty girl his daughter is!"

A gentle knock hurried his toilet.
"Dinner is served, sir," said a sweet voice, and he followed the attractive looking Abigail to the little drawing room, where his host introduced him to the half dozen clever men who had been assembled in his honor. An involuntary exclamation of delight escaped the lips of the convives as they entered the dining room at the exquisite arrangement of the table. The center was completely covered with so-called green moss, out of which grew quantities of tiny woodland flowers.
Blocks of sparkling ice held flasks of Rhenish wine in their hollowed out centers, and canles screened with rose colored shades gave a charming and sufficient light. The attractive hostess in the simplest of white gowns presided with pretty dignity, and two deft maids, dressed alike with dainty freshness, served the well cooked dinner.

The entertainment was altogether a decided social success, and the Englishman was profuse in his expressions of delight. The next morning he took his departure, being driven to the station by Meta, neatly attired in chevrons and serge. His astonishment would have been great could he have beheld the scene that followed, when the demure maid servants danced around the old gentleman with their caps borne aloft on the end of broomsticks in triumph.

"You wicked hussies," said their father, trying in vain to look angry, but failing signally. "How could you play me such a trick! I never recognized you until dinner was announced, and then it was too late to do anything but submit."
"But we wanted the whole thing to be a success," pleaded the quondam servants, "and it was impossible to arrange it otherwise."
"Well, I forgive you," said their parent, laughing in spite of himself.
"But mind, I shall never allow such a performance again."—New York Tribune.

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS.

William T. Lee, druggist, believes that the secret of success is perseverance.
Therefore he persists in keeping the finest line of perfumeries, toilet articles, cosmetics, drugs and chemicals on the market. He especially invites all persons who have palpitation, short breath, weak or hungry spells, pain in side or shoulder, oppression, night mare, dry cough, smothering, dropsy or heart disease to try Dr. Miles' unequalled New Heart Cure, before it is too late. It has the largest sale of any similar remedy.
Fine book of testimonials free. Dr.
Miles' Restorative Nervine is unsurpassed for sleeplessness, headache, fits, etc., and it contains no opiate.

Thackeray and Tobacco.
Thackeray rarely wrote without a cigar between his teeth. In his "Fitz boodle Papers" he jocularly suggests that all the hullabaloo against smoking has been raised by women, who are jealous of it as a rival. And it is a rival to them, he admits, "and their conqueror too. Germany has been puffing away for three score years. France smokes to a man. Do you think you could keep the enemy out of England? Ask the clubhouses. I, for my part, do no despise to see a bishop lolling out of the Athenaeum with a cheroot in his mouth, or at any rate, a pipe stuck in his shovel hat."—Exchange.

TO A PIANIST IMPROVISING.

Play me again that moonlit melody
As silvery sweet as the evening breeze
That soft o'er Eden bower from mellow throats
Of raptured nightingales outflowed. Untie,
With thy feet finger tips the airy fry
Of amiable imps on ether wave to float
Or sport astride a starbeam, till remote
The far eyed dawn crimson the hooded sky
And melts the merry crew. Then slowly play Your deep cathedral strains of ocean might
To cloud-robbed meditation; such alone
I most delight to hear. Thence if the way
Be gentle, lead me up the unsly height,
Until, like gods, we have dull earth outgrown.
—Philip Becker Goetz in Boston Transcript.

He undoubtedly found much innocent pleasure in this.

One afternoon, as he was so engaged, he was assailed by a new apprehension.

Suppose that Ricketts, the marble cutter, should fall to inscribe the date of his death in the space left vacant for it!

There was almost no likelihood of such an omission, but there was at least a possibility of it.

He glanced across the cemetery toward Jerry Hurley's unmarked mound and shuddered.

Then he thought laboriously.

When he left the cemetery in such time as to avoid a delay of his evening meal and a consequent outburst of anger on the part of his old housekeeper, he had taken a resolution.

"Three score years and ten, says the Bible," he muttered to himself as he walked homeward. "The scriptural lifetime 'll do for me."

A week thereafter old Tommy gazed proudly upon the finished inscription.

"Died Nov. 11, 1890," was the newest bit of biography there engraved.

"But it's two years and more till Nov. 11, 1890," said a voice at his side.

Tommy merely cast an indifferent look upon the speaker and walked off without a word.

The whole village now thought that Tommy had become a monomaniac upon the subject of his tombstone. Perhaps he had.

No one has been able to learn from his friend, Billy Skidmore, what thoughts he may have communicated to the latter upon the matter.

Tommy now lived for no other apparent purpose than to visit his tombstone daily. He no longer confined his walks thither to the pleasant days. He went in weather the most perilous to so old and frail a man.

One of his prospective heirs took sufficient interest in him to advise more care of his health.

"I can easily keep alive till the time comes," returned the antique. "There's only a year left."

Rapidly his hold upon life relaxed. A week before Nov. 11, 1890, he went to bed and staid there. People began to speculate as to whether his unique prediction—or, I should say, his decree—would be fulfilled to the very day.

Upon the fifth day of his illness Death threatened to come before the time that had been set for receiving him.

"Isn't this the 10th?" the old man mumbled.

"No," said his housekeeper, who, with one of his nieces, the doctor, and Billy Skidmore, attended the ill man. "It's only the 9th."

"Then I must fight for two days more. The tombstone must not lie."

And he rallied so well that it seemed as if the tombstone would lie, nevertheless, for old Tommy was still alive at 11:30 on the night of Nov. 11. Moreover, he had been in his senses when last awake, and there was every likelihood that he would look at the clock whenever his eyes should next open.

"He can't live till morning, that's sure," said the doctor.

"But, good Lord! you don't mean to say he'll hold out till after 12 o'clock," said Billy Skidmore, whose anxiety only had sustained him in his grief at the approaching dissolution of his friend.

"Quite probably," replied the doctor.

"Good heavens! Tommy won't rest easy in his grave if he doesn't die on the 11th. The monument would be wrong."

"Oh, that won't matter," said the niece.

Billy looked at her in amazement. Was his old friend's sacred wish to miscarry thus?

"Yes, 'twill matter," he said in a loud whisper. "And if time won't wait for Tommy of its own accord, we'll make it. When did he last see the clock?"

"Half past 9," said the housekeeper.

"Then we'll turn it back to 10," said Skidmore, acting as he spoke.

"But he may hear the town clock strike."

Billy said never a word, but plunged into his overcoat, threw on his hat and hurried out into the cold night.

"Ten minutes to midnight," he said, as he looked up at the town clock upon the church steeple. "Can I skin up them ladders in time?"

Tommy awoke once before the last slumber. Billy was by his bedside, as were the doctor, the housekeeper and the niece. The old man's eyes sought the clock.

"Eleven," he murmured. Then he was silent, for the town clock had begun to clang. He counted the strokes—eleven. Then he smiled and tried to speak again.

"Almost—live out—birthday—seventy—tombstone—all right."

He closed his eyes, and, inasmuch as the town clock furnishes the official time for Rearward, the published report of Tommy McGuffey's going records that he passed at twenty-five minutes after 11 p. m., Nov. 11, 1890.

Very few people knew that time turned back one hour and a half in order that the reputation of Tommy McGuffey's tombstone for veracity might be spotless in the eyes of future generations.

Billy Skidmore, the sexton, arranged to have Rearward time ready for the sun when it rose upon the following morning.—R. N. Stephens in Philadelphia Press.

Injurious Eating.

There are many people who prefer "gamy" or "high" meats, or, in other words, meats that are a little over the line of decomposition. Nor are they ready to accept the fact, long ago established, that such meats are not only unfit food, but are in a high degree harmful.

When decomposition occurs poisons are developed. Healthy adults are able to resist these poisons to a trifling extent. Just where this resistance lies, no one knows, but it is generally accepted that it is in the liver. This theory is supported by the fact that those who are inclined to be bilious and have sluggish and otherwise deranged livers are always upset, if not made really ill, by meats or fish that have become in the slightest degree tainted.—Boston Herald.

He undoubtedly found much innocent pleasure in this.

One afternoon, as he was so engaged, he was assailed by a new apprehension.

Suppose that Ricketts, the marble cutter, should fall to inscribe the date of his death in the space left vacant for it!

There was almost no likelihood of such an omission, but there was at least a possibility of it.

He glanced across the cemetery toward Jerry Hurley's unmarked mound and shuddered.

Then he thought laboriously.

When he left the cemetery in such time as to avoid a delay of his evening meal and a consequent outburst of anger on the part of his old housekeeper, he had taken a resolution.

"Three score years and ten, says the Bible," he muttered to himself as he walked homeward. "The scriptural lifetime 'll do for me."

A week thereafter old Tommy gazed proudly upon the finished inscription.

"Died Nov. 11, 1890," was the newest bit of biography there engraved.

"But it's two years and more till Nov. 11, 1890," said a voice at his side.

Tommy merely cast an indifferent look upon the speaker and walked off without a word.

The whole village now thought that Tommy had become a monomaniac upon the subject of his tombstone. Perhaps he had.

No one has been able to learn from his friend, Billy Skidmore, what thoughts he may have communicated to the latter upon the matter.

Tommy now lived for no other apparent purpose than to visit his tombstone daily. He no longer confined his walks thither to the pleasant days. He went in weather the most perilous to so old and frail a man.

One of his prospective heirs took sufficient interest in him to advise more care of his health.

"I can easily keep alive till the time comes," returned the antique. "There's only a year left."

Rapidly his hold upon life relaxed. A week before Nov. 11, 1890, he went to bed and staid there. People began to speculate as to whether his unique prediction—or, I should say, his decree—would be fulfilled to the very day.

Upon the fifth day of his illness Death threatened to come before the time that had been set for receiving him.

"Isn't this the 10th?" the old man mumbled.

"No," said his housekeeper, who, with one of his nieces, the doctor, and Billy Skidmore, attended the ill man. "It's only the 9th."

"Then I must fight for two days more. The tombstone must not lie."

And he rallied so well that it seemed as if the tombstone would lie, nevertheless, for old Tommy was still alive at 11:30 on the night of Nov. 11. Moreover, he had been in his senses when last awake, and there was every likelihood that he would look at the clock whenever his eyes should next open.

"He can't live till morning, that's sure," said the doctor.

"But, good Lord! you don't mean to say he'll hold out till after 12 o'clock," said Billy Skidmore, whose anxiety only had sustained him in his grief at the approaching dissolution of his friend.

"Quite probably," replied the doctor.

"Good heavens! Tommy won't rest easy in his grave if he doesn't die on the 11th. The monument would be wrong."

"Oh, that won't matter," said the niece.

Billy looked at her in amazement. Was his old friend's sacred wish to miscarry thus?

"Yes, 'twill matter," he said in a loud whisper. "And if time won't wait for Tommy of its own accord, we'll make it. When did he last see the clock?"

"Half past 9," said the housekeeper.

"Then we'll turn it back to 10," said Skidmore, acting as he spoke.

"But he may hear the town clock strike."

Billy said never a word, but plunged into his overcoat, threw on his hat and hurried out into the cold night.

"Ten minutes to midnight," he said, as he looked up at the town clock upon the church steeple. "Can I skin up them ladders in time?"

Tommy awoke once before the last slumber. Billy was by his bedside, as were the doctor, the housekeeper and the niece. The old man's eyes sought the clock.

"Eleven," he murmured. Then he was silent, for the town clock had begun to clang. He counted the strokes—eleven. Then he smiled and tried to speak again.

"Almost—live out—birthday—seventy—tombstone—all right."

He closed his eyes, and, inasmuch as the town clock furnishes the official time for Rearward, the published report of Tommy McGuffey's going records that he passed at twenty-five minutes after 11 p. m., Nov. 11, 1890.

Very few people knew that time turned back one hour and a half in order that the reputation of Tommy McGuffey's tombstone for veracity might be spotless in the eyes of future generations.

THE AIR.

Like some mysterious, sentient thing,
It throbs to throbbing lands and seas;
I hear it weep, I hear it sing,
In vagrant wind or breeze.

It fills the ghostly gloom of night
With halcyon calm, with storm and clash;
And I can trace its farther flight
When autumn meteors flash.

It flings the new dawn's glory wide
Over the dusk of silent shores,
Over the misty hills which hide
Sleep in their rocky cores.

And when it feels the shock and rowd
Of the electric fire, it shows
Mad splendors leaping from the cloud,
Booming their thunder blows.

Or else, above that frozen land
Which sends the piercing winter forth,
It marks, in colors rich and bland,
The aurora of the north!

—George Edgar Montgomery in Harper's Weekly.

WHAT FRED SAW.

The day was very pleasant, but I could not enjoy it.

Long, weary months I had been in the darkened room, and still they kept me there, allowing no breath of the pure, cool air to reach my feverish head.

I tried to open the window, but I was not strong enough, and I fell back in my chair, breathing the stifling air, which every moment became more oppressive.

I thought I could not endure it, yet how could I avoid it? There was only one way without danger of discovery: a step into the hall, and those spiral stairs would take me to the house-top—to the observatory.

Waiting until I was sure the way was clear, I stepped softly into the hall, and, ascending the stairs, though with much difficulty, I was soon enjoying the forbidden pleasure of breathing the free air, untainted with the fumes of the nauseous drugs that had been dealt out to me with an unsparing hand all through the long, cold winter.

How exhilarating! I wondered that I had been housed so long. I looked down upon the group of young ladies who were sporting on the lawn.

SALEM, September 5, 1891.

The new dress goods continue to come in force, and the stock grows further and further above and beyond all rival ones, as far on the score of reasonable prices as on the indisputable superiority of qualities, styles, varieties and colorings.

You who are planning on the fall dress already should keep constant watch of the coming, as every day now is adding new and beautiful things.

West transept, second floor.

Fall coats for infants and children up to 4 years of age are now ready—the strong advance guard of them. The styles are unusually fetching this season.

An early selection is eminently a safe one in this instance.

LITERARY NOTES.

No one can appreciate the horrors of the recent Park Place disaster in New York, which involved the loss of nearly a hundred lives, without looking at the graphic pictures of the affair printed in Frank Leslie's Weekly this week. In its suddenness, its mysterious character, and the awful loss of life it involved, it is one of the most remarkable calamities of modern times. The People's Baths of New York, the annual encampment of the Sons of Veterans, adventures in Alaska, street scenes in Chicago, the trials and pleasures of the city business man who summers in the country, are all illustrated in Leslie's Weekly this week. Price ten cents. Get it of your newsdealer, in English or German.

The Century Magazine will celebrate the 400th anniversary of the discovery of America by publishing a Life of Columbus written especially for that magazine by Emilio Castelar, the famous Spanish orator, statesman and author. The work is written in Spanish, and will be carefully translated. Senor Castelar, whose interest in and admiration for America are well known, has made a careful study of the new historical material bearing upon the subject, and it is said that his papers will be very richly illustrated. Other articles dealing with the discovery of America are in course of preparation for the same magazine.

In view of the present timeliness of the subject, The Century has arranged to print during the coming year an important series of articles on the general subject of Agriculture and the Government's relation to the farmer. Among the topics to be treated are "Agricultural Possibilities of the United States," "The Farmer's Discontent," "What the Government is doing for the Farmer," etc. Mr. J. R. Dodge, Statistician of the Agricultural Department, Mr. A. W. Harris, of the same department, Professor Brewer of Yale, and others, are among the writers.

As was expected, the greatest interest has been exhibited in the new story by Amelie Rives which was begun in the August number of the Cosmopolitan. The second part appears in the September number and the story will close in the following issue. The September issue of the Cosmopolitan Magazine is a "woman's number" so far as the authorship of its articles is concerned, but the general interest of the periodical is sustained by the variety and timeliness of the topics treated. The opening article, on Edouard Dattelle, is by Lady Dilke, and is profusely and beautifully illustrated with reproductions of the famous artist's most noteworthy paintings. Malmaison in the Market, by Mary Bacon Ford, describes the waiting for tunes of the house celebrated for the residence there of the ill-fated Empress Josephine. There are besides papers on the Evolution of the Society Journal, by Mrs. Roger A. Pryor; Society Women as authors, by Anna Vernon Dorsey; a pretty story, Il Mandolinista, by Daisy O'Brien, and verses by Katherine Grosjean, Mrs. Charles B. Foote and Susau Hartley Swett, all the important articles being liberally illustrated.

American writers of short stories are winning golden opinions abroad. A recent number of the London Spectator, in the course of an appreciative review of Annie Trumbull Slosson's Seven Dreamers, says: "Mrs. Slosson has written a singularly beautiful and fascinating volume; and it is a volume, too, which possesses a peculiar interest, in virtue of the fact that the genius of its author makes itself manifest in the one literary form in which any indications of genius are most seldom to be found. We use the word 'genius,' knowing well that genius is as rare as it is precious; but we know no other word which adequately represents the combination of felicitous invention, of imaginative insight, of quaint fancy, and of delicate literary expression which is to be found in these stories."

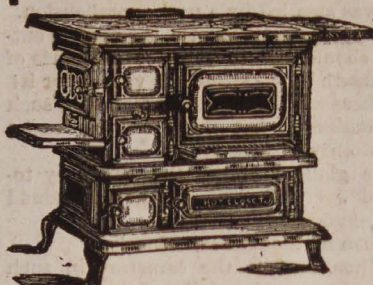

Bright and breezy the Chaperone Magazine, published at St. Louis, Mo., comes to us this month, diffusing a multitude of sunbeams into the dark corners, and clearing the cobwebs and dust of ages gathered about the routine duties of a newspaper office. Were we called upon to hunt a synonym for Chaperone we should immediately pronounce it sunshine, not only for its glorious garb of pictures and cheery surroundings, but for the wholesome nutriment found between its pages, so conducive to the mental and moral strengthening of its readers. The womanly touch of the gentle gifted editor, Mrs. Annie L. Y. Swart, may be traced throughout its versatile departments, and the present number contains from her own individual pen, a beautiful poem, "The End of the Story;" the sentiment pervading is further enhanced by an exquisite illustration of a dreamy maiden beneath blossoming boughs with the opened book upon her lap where the last page has evidently been turned. The ably edited "Dress and Fashion," with its quaintly cut heading, is also the pen work of Mrs. Swart, and presents a thorough test of the literary versatility of the writer. Among other choice selections found therein, is a poem called the "Bridge at St. Louis," by W. J. Tilley. A critical analysis of the methods of M. L. Solon, the Art Decorator, accompanied by ten illustrations which aid in explaining this artist's specialty, is full of useful information. Mr. N. K. Orff is at the business helm of the Chaperone with brain and ability clearly defined in its management.

To show how the late Mr. Burgess's mind leaned to yachts and yachting, a slight glance over his yachting career will demonstrate. In the building season, which took in the winter, no weather was too stormy or cold enough to keep him from making his weekly visit to Lawley and Pierce's shops. An hour at the Point would not satisfy him, and the dark of evening often found him wending his way to his home in aristocratic Back Bay. Said I to George Lawley, the boatbuilder, the other day, "What is your first remembrance of Mr. Burgess?" Young George replied, "He came into my shop soon after we came to the Point, and looked over a large cabin cat-boat which we were building, and putting his hand on her said, 'she will make a very good boat.' We chatted for awhile. 'Call again,' said I, and in a few days the stranger called again. We had a good talk for nearly the whole afternoon on that day, and do you know that he was the same modest man when he came to talk over the plans of the Puritan and Mayflower that he was in those days when we sat on a tool chest discussing that cat-boat.—New England Magazine for September.

How Paris Cleans Its Streets.

In Paris the streets are cleaned every day. They are sprinkled and swept and the gutters sluiced. This work really begins early in the morning. The carts go through the streets, take the garbage and ashes from the galvanized iron buckets and barrel-like receptacles which are on the sidewalk at this hour. Any particles that are spilled on the sidewalk or street are swept into a shovel, thrown into a cart, and all hauled to the cleansing works. Depending on the state of the weather, the street may then be sprinkled. After this the impurities are swept into the gutters by horse-power sweepers, three diagonally abreast. Then it is that the water is turned on in large volumes, and men or woman with willow brooms scour the gutters, pushing and sweeping the water and its contained impurities in the direction of the sewer opening. This scours the gutter and the pavement some three or four feet out from the curbing. In a short time, however, the water begins to run clear; one can see the clear, yellow sand lying in the bottom of it, as though it had not known uncleanness. It is not an uncommon thing to see the women who sell flowers from their carts on the streets dipping their bouquets into this water, for the purpose of adding to their freshness. Every street, passage, court, alley, public square is cleaned and purified every day in this way. In some of the narrow and less frequented streets and passages the work is naturally delayed until later in the day. In this way the water supply is not overtaxed.

TITUS & BUCKLEY'S Complete House Furnishing Emporium.

What is an Emporium? What goes into its make up? Why the term? The term at once suggests something large. A business conducted on an extensive scale. A mart of trade where everything of a special branch or several branches of a particular line are gathered together under one head. Such a combination properly managed affords at once immense advantages over single department stores. Advantages in the way of trading with one salesman. Buying your goods at one place. Quicker service. Contracting a single bill in place of three or four. And lower prices ALWAYS from the fact that the items of expense in running such a store are made smaller in a dozen ways. Such is our Emporium, and its popularity is best attested by our constantly increasing trade. Remember that we have four floors fully stocked with GOODS THAT SELL.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

TREMONT THEATRE.

Next Monday night, Sept. 7, the Tremont's stage will be taken possession of by a great Boston favorite.

There are few artists on the stage so well known and so thoroughly well liked, both in and out of the profession, as jolly little Fanny Rice, who comes at the head of her own company of singers and comedians in a new musical comedy, written especially for her by Mr. Arthur Wallack, son of the late Lester Wallack, entitled "A Jolly Surprise."

"A Jolly Surprise" has been rehearsed and staged under the personal direction of Mr. Jesse Williams, formerly stage manager and musical director of the New York Casino and Madison Garden Theatre. Miss Rose Becket has arranged the dances, and no expense has been spared to make winsome Fanny Rice and her "Jolly Surprise" all that could be wished. During the play Miss Rice will make many different changes of costume. Several of her imported modern dresses are said to be perfect dreams of the dressmaker's art. In fact, the costumes of the company as a whole (which have been made by M. Herman, costumer for Daly's New York Theatre) will far surpass in point of elegance anything ever seen in a musical comedy.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE.

At the Grand Opera next week managers Proctor and Mansfield will produce the great melo-drama, "My Jack," which had such an excellent run at the Grand last year. All the magnificent scenic effects and realistic stage mechanism, including the explosions in the light-house, the grand desert scene, the shipwreck and the deck of a man-of-war; all of which will be given with all the minute perfectness of detail that justly commanded such enthusiastic commendation when this admirable drama was presented at the Grand Opera House last season. Mr. Walter Sanford, who impersonates the leading character in a manner which has won the commendation of press and public, has the support of an excellent company, every member of which has been chosen with a special view to his adaptability to the character. The production will be in every respect characteristic of the able management of the Grand Opera House, who command resources in the way of scenic effects and stage mechanism unsurpassed by any other theatre in Boston.

BOSTON THEATRE.

Denman Thompson opens at this theatre on Labor Day, presenting his charming New England idyl, "The Old Homestead." This play has had a very long run in New York city.

BOSTON MUSEUM.

"Ye Earle Trouble," a romance of '76, is a brilliant success, and will no doubt run for several weeks. An extra matinee will be given Labor Day.

HOLLIS STREET THEATRE.

The Hollis Street Theatre presents Joseph McArthur's "Blue Jeans" next week.

GLOBE THEATRE.

"The Power of the Press," a very powerful drama, will be the attraction at the Globe next week.

HOWARD ATHENEUM.

The Howard Athenaeum gives a special festival next week, with an extra matinee Labor Day.

PARK THEATRE.

Neil Burgess and "The County Fair" opened this week for a run at the Park Theatre. This piece has had a long run in New York. The horse race scene is a marvel of realism.

According to Mr. G. H. Hathaway, of the Redpath Lyceum Bureau, the business of lecturing is about the most lucrative that a man can engage in—provided that he is properly equipped with talent, eloquence, previous fame and a few trivial, like attributes. Ex-Senator Ingalls, for example, is sure to make $30,000 on the platform between now and next spring if he keeps his engagements.

Burdette, the famous humorist, has not fully decided about his plans for next season. He may not lecture at all, or confine himself to engagements in the vicinity of Philadelphia, in one of whose beautiful suburbs he has made his home.

The combination of Mile. De Vere and Campanini, with a strong support, offers an entertainment to music lovers of the greatest excellence. The Redpath Lyceum Bureau has secured these artists for a term of five weeks, beginning the middle of October, and already nearly every night of their time has been engaged.

The New York Philharmonic Club, with Miss Marion Weed, contralto, will have the most successful season since their formation. Over 15 concerts have been contracted for by the Redpath Lyceum Bureau, who are their sole managers, and their tour will take them as far as the Pacific coast.

Rev. H. C. Hovey, D.D., will have a new lecture on Cave-Dwellers. He owns about 1500 slides for stereopticon of cave views taken on the ground by flashlight, and at least one made by the light of a fire-fly.

A new concert company now being formed by the Redpath Bureau, will probably receive the name of The Lyceum Company. It is to consist of Miss Inez McCusker, the soprano who was so great a favorite when with the Schubert Male Quartet of Chicago; T. D. Van Osten, clarinet, now soloist at Congress Spring Park, Saratoga; Miss Annie Coffin, of Nantucket, reader; Miss Gertrude Lufkin, piano and cornet, and a violinist not yet decided on.

The Remenyi Company is booked for Philadelphia, Nov. 5, in the Y. M. C. A. Course; Hartford, Nov. 16; Albany, Oct. 28. The great violinist will be heard in nearly every large city in the country in the course of the season, but the greater part of the time will be devoted to the West. He will travel as far as the Pacific coast.

Edouard Remenyi, the king of violinists, who travels this season in America under the management of the Redpath Lyceum Bureau, has no living rival. Critics of the highest rank have said that he is superior to all criticism, and that he may never have a successor.

A Plan for Private Streets.

To the Editors of the Somerville Journal: I have been a citizen of this city seventeen years, and should like to make a few remarks.

I think that we should have clean streets and good sidewalks to attract a good class of people to the city. Let the city take better care of her private streets and keep them clean, if nothing else. We are taxed as much as those who live on accepted streets, but we get no benefit for our money. I have never seen anything belonging to the city on my street except an ash team and the tax collector. Why should not some of the appropriation for highways be used for us? We at least desire more consideration than those get who live on streets newly laid out.

Last summer our street was cleaned through the efforts of a city official and no little begging on my part. Though thankful for small favors, yet I wish for more.

A GRUMBLER.

As the sun is superior to the stars, so Dana's is superior to all other Sarsaparillas.

Rain Doctor.

Frank Melbourne, the rain doctor, has been apparently successful in his first test here. He has been hard at work since Saturday on the loft of a small barn located on a plateau overlooking the city. All the apparatus he has had was carried into the barn in four small grip-sacks. A hole in the roof has been his only communication with the outside world. Tuesday morning the signal office here reported that a storm which was approaching Monday had been diverted to the north and that indications here were for dry weather. The morning was clear and bright, but at noon clouds commenced forming along the horizon on all sides. Masses of them crowded in, apparently attracted toward Melbourne's laboratory; Business in the town almost ceased and thousands were out watching the clouds. At 2.40 o'clock there was a heavy peal of thunder, and vivid flashes of lightning and in a few moments the rain poured down in torrents. It continued 20 minutes and then the sun came out clear and warm. Melbourne sent word from his den that within an hour it would rain again and would rain for an hour. It did so and .48 of an inch of rain fell.

An effort will be made to secure Melbourne for a series of experiments, to which experts from the East will be invited.

KITCHEN ECONOMY

Begins with the cooking stove or range. The difference between a stove and a range is that the latter has more accommodations for pots and kettles. A good range is the chief household necessity.

WHAT IS A GOOD RANGE?

We should say: one that is well planned, well built, of Good Quality Iron, keeps a fire easily, bakes well, don't "burn out" too much coal. Its name is

THE WINTHROP.

Not quite so large, not quite so heavy as the Magee, Household or Crawford (we sell these also) but a thoroughly good range that in careful hands will last for years. A handsome range too, and the best value for the money we ever sold.

$18.90

Is the price. Very likely you didn't know so excellent a range could be bought for so little money. It couldn't be before this season. It can't be now except you buy of us.

Mr. Kavanagh's Reason Dethroned.

Mr. Edward Kavanagh, who twenty years ago or more was proprietor of the grocery establishment known then as the Union store, now conducted by Horace Bushby, was found wandering about on Main street early Wednesday morning by the night police, and was locked up for safe keeping, as he showed marked signs of insanity. He talked incoherently, and said he had been driven out-of-doors by six Chinamen. He was armed with two knives and a revolver, which was cocked and primed. He was committed later in the day to the Danvers Insane Asylum, after examination by Drs. G. M. Frost and C. C. Pike.

While engaged in the grocery business, he made a snug little sum in comparatively short time, and invested to some extent in the Dublin district at the time of the boom. Success in speculation induced him to sell his grocery business and embark in land and stock operations upon a large scale, making some money at first, but eventually his entire accumulations were substantially all swept away, and for quite a number of years he has picked up a living by minor stock speculations, principally in patent companies.

About four or five years ago he lost his wife, and since then has brooded over his troubles until his mind has become totally unbalanced. He is about 60 years of age.

Peabody Man Drops Dead in Boston.

Tuesday afternoon about five o'clock as a correspondent of the PRESS was passing through Portland street, Boston, an unknown man was discovered lying in the doorway of No. 173, which is just around the corner from Causeway street. Investigation proved the man dead. In his pocket was found a ticket to Peabody, and about $8.00 in money. He was about 33 years of age, light complexion, 5 feet 10 inches tall and weighed about 160 pounds. The remains were taken to North Grove Morgue and afterwards identified by officer Sweeney as Geo. F. Lunt of this town, a morocco dresser in the employ of C. J. Larabee. He was returning to Peabody from Deerfield, Me., where he had been on a short visit to his invalid mother and sister. Death was caused by epilepsy the doctors said.

Republican Caucus.

On Wednesday evening, according to previous notice, the Republican caucus was called to order in lower town hall, by B. Frank Southwick as chairman of the town committee. B. G. Hall was chosen secretary. As soon as organization was perfected, W. G. Cook moved that all delegates be chosen at once, by ballot. The twenty-five, more or less, present, or a majority of them fell into it, and the ballots, all printed, were scooped out of the mover's pocket and quickly passed around, and as the feat was a complete surprise, the entire ticket was as quickly elected.

The delegates are as follows:—

State convention, Sept. 16.—B. Frank Southwick, William F. Walker, Albert E. Southwick, George E. Parker, Charles L. Osborn, Francis H. Appleton.

Senatorial convention.—Benjamin G. Hall, George E. Parker, Charles M. Poor, George C. Farrington, Cyrus T. Batchelder, Frank D. Dodge, B. Frank Southwick, Alexander B. Merrill, Elbridge Rust, Bennett B. Humphrey.

County and councillor convention.—Leverett Poor, Eben P. Trask, George H. Tenney, Reuben G. Nelson, Albert H. Merrill, Nicholas M. Quint, Benjamin C. Perkins.

Obituary.

Deacon John K. Cole, father of J. K. Cole of the Centre School, died at his home in Boxford Thursday morning of apoplexy. He was stricken down while at work in the field, and did not regain consciousness. For thirty five years he served as deacon of the Boxford church, and for thirty years was the Sunday school superintendent. He had often served the town as selectman and assessor, and was representative to the Legislature in 1860. Deacon Cole was especially interested and active in the church, as his long service as an officer of it indicates; and in all town affairs he was ever a ready and willing helper, strictly honest and upright in all his dealings, as a neighbor and friend ever ready to lend a helping hand, and in his home a most devoted husband and loving father, his loss will be deeply felt by all who knew him.

We have decided to make for a short time—until further notice—

CABINETS
$4.00
PER DOZ.

Our price has always been $5.00 without deviation; and for two years we have done no club work. We shall probably never sell clubs again, their day having gone by, but there are many who do not care during these hard times to pay so much as $5.00 a dozen for pictures, but who still want the best. As we wish to reach this class, but do not believe in charging two prices for the same thing, we have decided to adopt the medium price of $4.00 for a short time. The quality of work will be the same as heretofore.

Benjamin D. Hill, the well known newspaper correspondent and florist had a fall from a ladder on Tuesday afternoon and landed in a bed of cinders, receiving some contusions and scratches. The ladder was old and proved too weak to sustain his weight.

The early part of the week, a sun flower which had taken root in a notch of an elm, 15 feet above the ground, in front of the house occupied by Freeman L. Brown on Wallis street bloomed out. The plant had been watched for some time by Mr. Brown, who feared it would be broken before blooming. It still stands the cynosure of all eyes.

There is talk of cutting a street through the land of George Hoeman next the old Quaker burying ground, to connect Main and Aborn streets. The street would be nearly opposite Grove street and form substantially a prolongation of the same. The grade at that point would be so steep as to make it very uncomfortable, and very little advantage is to be derived from the extension except to open up house lots.

The Selectmen last Saturday, passed orders enabling an arrangement between the Nantuaeg and Lynn railroads regarding the use of the trolley wire of the former company. This will save stringing another set of wires. The Lynn company will begin at once setting poles in order to give the town plant committee opportunity to use them, although the railroad electric equipment will not be finished until spring.

The committee on the Veteran Firemen's trip to Lowell, September 23, have completed all arrangements for the field day. The party will leave the town at 8 o'clock, and will be accompanied by the Beverly drum corps. The price of round trip tickets, including a handsome thirty-five cent badge, will be $1.50. This does not include the cost of dinner. A special train will be provided for the return trip. It is expected that Peabody will send the largest crowd that ever left town for a firemen's muster.

According to the notice given in the PRESS, the County Commissioners met Wednesday morning in Town Hall, to hear and act upon the petition of the selectmen to widen and straighten Lowell street, above the estate of Eben U. King. Mr. King favored the petition, and offered the Commissioners a strip of land upon condition that they remove and rebuild the stone wall. A view was taken by the Commissioners, who were accompanied by Chairman Goulding and Superintendent of the Streets, H. A. Besse.

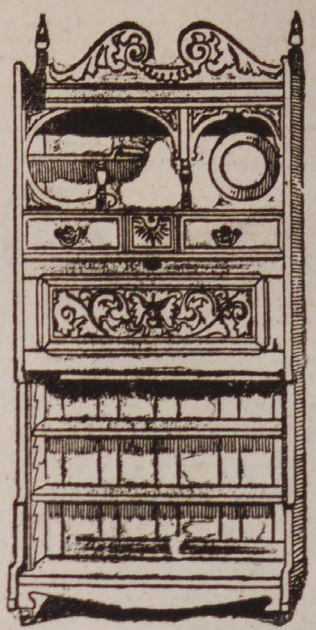

The will of the late William H. Little leaves the estate on Main street to his son and daughter and their issue if any and in the event of failure of issue, the remainder vests in trustees, for the purpose of establishing a hospital. The appointments are to be made—three by the Unitarian Church, one by the First Parish, and one by the Board of Health. The will of Miss Eliza M. Little who died a few months since contains concurrent clauses, so that eventually the property must pass to the trustees referred to for hospital purposes.

On Thursday, Sept. 17th, commencing promptly at 10 o'clock A. M., Mr. C. S. Buffum, owner of the Washington Square Stables' Salem, Mass., is to sell by Public Auction his entire livery stock, consisting of 21 horses, 8 hacks, 4 carryalls, 5 buggies, 10 double harnesses, 10 single harnesses; all the robes, blankets, whips, stable tools, &c. The stock is one of the best in Essex County, the sale will be absolute, will begin promptly and J. E. Conant & Co., of Lowell, Mass., will serve as Auctioneers. Send to them for a catalogue. Sale will take place rain or shine.

What A Corn Palace is Like.

Only those who have visited the previous Corn Palaces at Sioux City can have anything like an adequate idea of the architectural possibilities of the product. In building the Palace a large structure is first erected of lumber, of a shape that will carry and show to advantage the multifarious decorations with which it is to be adorned. It is in form lofty, with broken lines, pinnacles, buttresses, bridges, gables, ornamental windows, etc. Over every inch of this wooden surface are laid corn and kindred plants in architectural harmony and in a multiplicity of designs. Corn is employed in the stalk, the ear, the kernel, and even the husk has its decorative uses. The various colors of the cereal, permit of a wide range of shading and coloring, while the artistic possibilities developed from year to year in building the Palace admit of the production of effects that are as startling as pleasurable. The interior work is especially fine and elaborate, the kernel of the corn being largely employed, and producing amazing and unique effects. Upon the walls are wrought pictures illustrating farm scenes, nursery tales, etc., with a fidelity surprising to those who have not before seen at one of the Sioux City Corn Palaces the varied artistic availability of the grain, and flowers, and frescoes, figures of persons and animals, and many artistic and ornamental shapes make the Palace a structure of unique beauty and imposing grandeur.

The great Corn Palace event of 1891 begins October 1 and continues until the 17th inclusive.

Make two cakes, one with Cleveland's baking powder; the second with any other.

Note the difference.

The Cleveland cake is fine grained, keeps its natural flavor and moisture; "the other" is coarse grained, as if the sugar was too coarse, soon dries out and becomes husky.

Cleveland's leavens best because its strength is produced by cream of tartar and soda only, not by ammonia or alum.

NOCTURNE.

All the vast dark wonder of the night,
All the air for the brown moth's wings to skim;
But the stars are far away from him,
And the open window is full of light.
The brown moth follows the candle's glow
Where golden haired Lois reads and dreams,
So still that an imagined saint seems,
With tapers before her and eyes bent low.
About her hair and the flame he wheels,
Her hair full of sunshine and sweeter yet
Than the yellow rose by the night dew wet,
So sweet that faint to the flame he reels.
In the sweep of his wings the candles flare,
And, what maddens him more, he does not know.
The dancing flame that scorches so,
Or the yellow splendor of her hair.
On her brow and neck, in soft little rings,
It lies like the tendrils of a vine;
He has never seen a web so fine,
And he fears to touch it with his wings.
So he whirls and frantically beats at the light
Till in torture down on her book he slips;
She sweeps him aside with her finger tips,
And his life flutters out into the night.

THE SOUL OF THE CAT.

Yee Sam Ling was a lonely one. He had friends in plenty and relatives, too, for that matter, but Ling had his own views on matrimony and he didn't believe anybody could be happy without a wife. It was strange why he had so suddenly taken on that belief, for hadn't he lived fifteen years away from his own Flowery Land! Of course he had.
He came first to the Golden Hills and went to work in the mines, but he couldn't stand it, for he used to feel the strange white devils at night, punching him in the back. So he gave his claim in the Golden Hills to a relative and traveled across the continent to New York, curled up like a mink on a seat of the smoking car.
He was idle for awhile and then started in to sell soap to the laundries, until finally he got enough of the American man's cash to rent a store. He put out his red sign, with the fluttering red streamers on it to keep the evil ones away, and he became a merchant. Every night for years he had crawled into his little bunk curtained off at the back of the store, and after comforting himself with the opium he loved so well he had fallen to sleep, to dream of pretty Chinese girls tottering on pink clouds across the water and stretching their arms out to him.
He often thought of China and the home life there, and he used to count the money in his trunk and wonder when he would have enough to go back and buy a koonfo's rank and wear a cap with the red button of the third degree. Then he thought he would buy with some of his money the prettiest girl in the province, and she would have feet so small that she couldn't walk at all unless she had a strong servant holding each hand.
He often played the lottery in the hope that he would win, and he burned prayer sticks before his kat god that he might have luck, but he might just as well have saved the sticks, for luck never came. So persistently did he lose that more than once he was tempted to let one of the burning prayer sticks fall over against the god and burn it, but he was afraid lest the deceit should be discovered and the god seek a just revenge.
One day there came into his store a white girl who lived on the top floor of the tenement around the corner. She had hair like the wong shik gold he used to dig out of the Golden hills.
"Say, John," she said, "me mother's run out o' sope, an she's up to her neck in washin. Gimme a bar!"
Ling was smitten with a great love. He remembered having seen this girl go past his store many times, but he never had such a chance as this to speak to her.
"You monnee want sope?" he asked.
"She washee?"
"Yes; I want er bar, an I want it quick."
"Alle lile," said Ling, and he clattered behind the narrow counter and pulled out from a shelf two bars of soap.
"You takkee two," he said. "No n'gan't/sin, you takkee; you sabe?" and he pushed the soap and the five pennies she had laid down away from him. Then he went on: "I lakkee you; you heap nice! Lat you name?"
"Gee, what graft!" said the girl; "so I get de sope for nuttin, do I, John? Well, me name's Maggie Sullivan, if yer want know."
Ling looked at her with admiring eyes. Then he pointed to the soap and pennies and said simply:
"You takkee. I heap lakkee you, sabe? You clum 'glain?"
"Yes, I sabe, John," said the girl, "an I'll come again."
So she went out and Ling went to the door and looked after her until she had disappeared around the corner. Then he went back behind the narrow counter and sat down on a stool. He rested his elbows on a pile of paper, sunk his chin in his hands and thought very hard. His thinking amounted to something, for he went to the little cubby room curtained off at the back of the store, and out of the big camphor wood chest he pulled some carefully folded clothes. He was a new man when he came out into the store again, and a couple of his countrymen who had dropped in to have a friendly chat and a smoke began to chaff him.
His old cloth blouse, with the shiny place on the back where his well oiled cue had hung, lay in a heap on the floor with his old pow tail and coarse trousers; instead he wore clothes of broad dark blue silk and his sandals were like those of a koonfo. A cold wind was blowing up the street. It made him shiver, but he stood his ground and watched for the coming of Maggie Sullivan.
Every day for a week he watched, until on the eighth day he saw her running by with a shawl over her head and a pitcher in her hand. "Hi-lo," he cried "hi-lo, Maggie S't'm'n! you com' n' chue?"
"Hello, John; how'd things? I'll se yer when I get th' old man's beer," an-she dashed on, while Ling went in and waited.

After awhile she came in with a rush.
"You lakkee China candy?" began Ling before she could say anything.
"Heap good!" and he shoved a queer little box full of keung toward her. "I lakkee you," he continued, while he picked at the gilt buttons on his blouse.
"I bling you nice close, heap nice, you sabe? Makkee you nice close, you dless heap nice, sabe? You mally me, you hab heap money."
"Marry you, John? Well, I guess not! Me old woman would pull the pigtail out of your head if she heard you makin any breaks like that."
"You mally me bimeby," said Ling, as though he felt sure he would win.
"So long, John!" she said, as she went out munching the candy. That was the first of the queer courtship. It struck Maggie seriously, as though she thought she might do worse.
"I don't know but what I'll marry the Chink," she said to herself. "I'll get all ther clothes an money I want an I'll be boss, you can bet!"
There was a cat which used to sleep under Ling's counter. She grew fat on the scraps of chow chop suey and chue yunk which fell from the table, and altogether lived a life of peace. But the day Ling proposed to Maggie Sullivan the cat's manner changed. Instead of sleeping under the counter all the day she took to walking on the counter, meowing uneasily in a wailing voice which filled the room with a distressful sound.
Then she would pause in her walk, and sitting on her haunches glare at Ling with staring eyes. Once or twice he drove her away, but she came back and glared until her eyes turned from green to purple. Once he struck her with his bamboo t'ung, and she retreated to a high shelf and watched him.
"The evil one possesses her," said Ling, and he burned more prayer sticks before his kashat Joss, but the wailing of the cat never ceased. She crept under Ling's bed that night and scratched at the matting on the floor; she paraded the little room, and her big shining eyes seemed to light up the dark place. From that night the cat was never at rest, and Ling became so stricken with a silent terror that he would go out into the street rather than cross her path.
He forgot about the cat a couple of days later, when Maggie Sullivan came in. She was better dressed than usual.
"Hello, John," she began, "I had a row with the old woman, and I've clim out. I'm dead sick of gittin jumped on. Now, if you want marry me on ther square, I'm with you, but I don't want any funny business in mine!"
"You mally me?" asked Ling, while a smile crept over his face. "Allee lile, I mally you."
"But I'll tell you, John," the girl went on, "you've got to cut that pigtail off and wear citizen's clothes. You got to be as white as clothes can kin make you, an you got to treat me white, too, or I'll shake you!"
Ling didn't want to lose his cue and he fought against what he considered a sacrilege, but he found Maggie relentless.
"I curl him up so," he said, as he twisted it about his head; "n I puttee on hat, so," and he pulled an old slouch hat down over his head, "n nobodly slee him, ha?"
No, even that wouldn't do, and Maggie went away saying: "I'm goin up to a lady friend's o' mine ter stay ternite, John, an I'll see you tomorrow, an if ther pigtail don't go I don't git married, see!"
Ling didn't quite see, but he thought a lot. He thought Maggie was the prettiest girl he had ever seen. There was nothing ch'ian about her. She had fine blue eyes, a trim figure and a shock of golden hair that attracted the Chinaman. The old cat jumped on the counter and yowled and stared at him, and he went out to get away from those green eyes. He went to the Joss house and burned thirty cents worth of prayer sticks and paper. He made up his mind quickly after that, almost ran down the dark, creaking steps and across the way to where the tai-tau-lo lived and did business.
"Take off this thing!" he said, when he sat down on the stool in front of the little razors and scissors.
"What!" said the barber, "are you crazy, or have the foreign devils got you too?"
"Cut it off, I tell you! Are you not here to do such work as this?"
"No, that is wrong. I knew your mother. What would she say if I did it? Her curses would come to me as well as to you, unworthy son."
Ling ran out while his courage lasted. He went to a Kwang-tung man who lived near Pell street and had no cue.
"Cut this thing off!" he said; he did not need to beg this time.
"Ha, ha!" laughed the Kwang-tung man, "you are going to be one of us; good!" and he picked up a big pair of shears. Snip! and Ling's cue was gone, cut close to his head. Out Ling ran, leaving his cue behind him. He went into his store and sat down to think, when up jumped the cat. Her eyes were yellow this time, and she howled mournfully.
"Get away, you evil thing!" and he pushed her off with a stick. He did not sleep that night; he dreamed strange things and saw strange sights; he thought of his home in far off China, and his mother and the little Chinese maidens whom he had known before he came to the new country. He smoked and saw faces in the clouds. In the morning his eyes were heavy and red with the opium, and he let his hired man do all the work. He lay in his cubby bunk and smoked the opium until he heard a voice. It sounded as if it came from a great distance. It said:
"Hello, where's the boss? In the back room? all right!"
The curtains were pulled back and Maggie Sullivan came in.
"Hitin ther pipe, eh? Well, that's bad for the blood. How's yer pigtail?"
"I cut him. He glone," said Ling half stupidly.
"That's good. I knew you'd come around. The Chinks allers do. Git up if yer a-goin ter git married."

Ling had a vague idea that he was very happy. The opium had brought a peaceful feeling, but he was rather stupid. Maggie sat on the edge of the bunk and the cat walked across the room with stately tread, glaring at her. She gazed at her feet, and at one bound was on her lap. "Hello, pussy!" she said, putting her face down and stroking the fur. Like a flash a paw shot out; five hooked, sharp claws were unheathed and dragged across the girl's cheek. She gave a frightened scream, and when Ling looked he saw three red lines down her face, from which blood was dripping. And the cat walked slowly across the floor with the same stately tread.
"I've got a nice looking face now!" said Maggie, "and I think I'll have that cat killed."
"Less," said Ling, "kill him," and he rose dreamily and tried to drive the cat out, but she wouldn't go. He gave it up and cursed the spirit which possessed the cat. "Some enemy of mine has died," he thought, "and his soul has gone into the cat." Maggie washed the blood from her face and put on three long strips of plaster, and then went around to the Five Points mission, where they were married. The minister, Mr. Boughton, asked them both a great many questions, and satisfied himself that everything was all right. Before he dismissed them he said he hoped Maggie would be happy.
"I hope so, sir," said she, "an they say the Chinks are good to their women."
They went back to the store then. There was a letter on the counter near the scales. It had come from China and was for Yee Sam Ling. The cat sat near it and would not move. Ling pushed her away with a stick, but she came back. He was afraid to put his hand out for the letter, so he pulled it toward him with his pipe. It was from his native town.
"Your good mother is dead," it said; "the scourge devil carried her away. It was her will that you return and marry the girl she has betrothed to you."
The letter fell from Ling's hands; he looked up and saw the cat still staring at him.
"My mother's soul is there to curse me," he whispered to himself, backing toward the door.
"It is she! She has come across the big water because I did not return," and he kept stepping backward.
"The curse has come upon me!" And he felt for his cue. Then he looked at Maggie and saw the marks of the claws. With a shriek he opened the door and rushed out!
"John's gone plumb crazy!" said Maggie to the attendant. "It's the opium, I guess. It knocks 'em all when they get the habit."
Ling never came back, so Maggie patched a truce with her mother and went back to the tenement. Nobody but the minister knows she is Mrs. Yee Sam Ling, and the new sign which swings over the door of the little store tells every one who looks up at it that Sun Quong sells Chinese groceries there. Sun Quong was the attendant.—Fred A. Wilson in New York Evening Sun.

Oysters Are a Luxury in England.
We do not exactly long for the Port Lincoln oyster of south Australia, which sometimes measures a foot across, and which, fried in bread crumbs and butter, is as much as an able-bodied man can consume at a sitting. Fortunately oysters are found in every sea except, perhaps, the Baltic, for some 2,000,000,000 are eaten annually in Europe alone. It is interesting to hear of "oyster gardens" near Sydney, where you go to bathe, taking a towel and an oyster knife, with a loaf and butter, where you deposit your clothes, and may eat as many oysters as you can open for a shilling.
There is no doubt that the oyster thus freshly taken from the bed may be tasted in the greatest perfection. Traveling disagrees with his liver, which is among the largest and most important organs, and keeping him in ice deteriorates the flavor, as it does that of all fish. The somewhat melancholy conclusion of the whole matter is that oysters are palatable, wholesome, nourishing—and expensive—and that a great many beds will have been laid down before they can be anything to us but a luxury or a medicine.
They are recommended as "soveran" against the influenza, and calculated to keep old people alive when all other food fails; but we may long in vain for days when a cookery book began its receipts with "Take a hundred and fifty oysters," or "Take of oysters two quarts." But, as they say in a neighboring island, "the best way to cook an oyster is to eat him raw."—Saturday Review.

"What! are they all gone?"
"Yes."
"I'm going to try a sort I've been reading about, if I have to send to Pittsburgh for 'em. Macbeth & Co.'s 'pearl-top.' They say their chimneys don't break."
"Another humbug, probably."
"Don't Muggins keep 'em?"
"I'm going to see. Give me a postal card. I'll have that chimney, anyhow."
Muggins got 'em for him, and did a thriving chimney business for several weeks, till everybody got 'em; and somehow his trade has increased all round ever since.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1891.

SOME DISSATISFACTION was expressed at the manner in which the caucus was conducted on Wednesday evening and especially on account of the prevalence of names of members of the Republican Town Committee.

The committee is altogether too large for practical work and so large it is almost impossible to restrain the temptation of monopolizing the honors.

A committee of five or seven for executive work would be fully as efficient and easier to assemble upon all occasions. If the plan of increasing keeps on, it will be in order next fall, to have a committee of the whole party.

MUCH INTEREST centres in the Senatorial contest of this district just at present. Danvers has elected a delegation known to be pronounced for Capt. Sillars of that town, and it is hinted that the whole northern end of the district will probably support the Danvers candidate; which will leave Peabody, Lynn and Saugus with what possible delegates may be secured elsewhere, to give Mr. Southwick the nomination.

Peabody is, of course, solid for Mr. Southwick, and it is quite probable that Lynn and Saugus will be substantially a unit for him, and if so, there is a reasonable certainty that Mr. Southwick will be re-nominated.

WE ARE pleased to note, after years of persistent application upon one side, and reverse delay upon the other, that the County Commissioners have prepared a place to which habitual truants can be committed.

The school at Lawrence is now all ready, and we have quite a number of boys who have earned a passport to that institution, while the Commissioners have been dilly-dallying with the petition and procrastinating upon one ground and another, particularly upon the plea that such a place was not needed.

Upon this question Col. Raymond failed of re-election last year, and it is not impossible that Mr. Bishop may receive a similar rebuke this fall.

The County has been divided upon the question, Salem and other places which had been previously provided with the required accommodations by private charity or through earlier municipal expenditures, opposing the plan, while in some of the small towns there was a lukewarmness, owing to peculiar local situations which rendered a truant school to them less desirable.

THERE NOW appears to be no obstacle in the way of a practically unanimous nomination for Hon. Charles H. Allen of Lowell. So far as heard from, it is easy to count up a handsome majority for the Lowell candidate.

Nomination too means election, notwithstanding the present incumbent has put himself out to make friends with the voters in almost every hamlet of the Commonwealth.

This is a Republican state and nothing but discontent in the Republican ranks, such as existed a year ago, could possibly lose the party the honors hitherto so long enjoyed.

Mr. Allen is a clean, progressive Republican. His campaign is free from any taints that might possibly reduce his voting strength. His candidacy possesses to the fullest degree that spontaneity which is so essential to the largest measure of success. Mr. Allen will sweep the state, against the present incumbent with an irresistible tide.

No one, not even the staunchest supporters of Mr. Crapo, have been able to raise a single objection to Mr. Allen's candidacy. They have been forced to admit reluctantly that the Lowell man is by far the more popular. But the very reluctance with which these admissions are wrung from the friends of Mr. Crapo, testify the more strongly the genuineness of Mr. Allen's universal popularity. The friends of Mr. Crapo met in Boston yesterday and decided to appeal to the delegates for support, but the tide is already set for the Lowell man and it seems impossible to change it.

NOTICE.

Notice is hereby given, that the subscriber has been duly appointed administrator of the estate of William Calvin Munroe, late of Peabody, in the county of Essex, merchant, deceased, and has taken upon himself that trust, by giving bonds, as the law directs. All persons having demands upon the estate of said deceased are required to exhibit the same, and all persons indebted to said estate are called upon to make payment to WILLIAM FRED MUNROE, Adm. Peabody, September 8, 1891.

ESSEX COUNTY.

The Lynn city council has voted to issue bonds for $150,000 for the payment of the debt maturing Sept. 23.

Rev. Albert E. Bradstreet accepts the call to the Congregationalist church at Topsfield for one year; he was dismissed from Shelburne Sept. 2.

There was a fire Wednesday morning in the grain elevator of Chas. J. Baker, corner of Park and Pleasant st. Beverly, suspected of incendiary origin.

The West Newbury Natural History Club has a field meeting on the banks of the Merrimack, a little above Carson's Mill, Friday, where Mrs. Horner read an essay.

There was a fire at 730 Wednesday in a barn on the Meacom estate, rear of the Opera House, Beverly. A man was seen running from the building, and there is no doubt of its being incendiary. A man was arrested yesterday who is supposed to have set several fires in that town. He was afterwards discharged.

The Naval Battalion went to Gloucester Thursday for a day's tour of duty on land and water. They went from Boston by special train and return by special train passing through Salem.

Louis Millet of Georgetown, in attempting to board a moving train at Bradford on Monday evening, slipped and had his left foot crushed. It was afterward amputated at the hospital in Haverhill.

An incendiary attempt at the Masonic building, on Cabot street, Beverly, was discovered about 9 o'clock on Monday evening. Shavings saturated with kerosene had been lighted, but the fortunate prompt discovery prevented serious damage.

Rev. George H. Young of the New South church, Boston, has accepted the call from the First Unitarian church of Lawrence to become its pastor, caused by the resignation of Rev. E. C. Abbott and will assume his new change next Sunday.

Postmasters J. Frank Dalton of Salem, W. G. Holt of Lawrence and W. G. Hale of Newburyport have been appointed a board of visitation by Postmaster General Wanamaker to inspect the 71 post office in Essex county and submit a full report of the business done.

A collision occurred between two cars on the electric line in Gloucester Thursday morning, by which the driver of one, Thomas Wilson, had both legs broken and the passengers were badly shaken up. One of the cars had waited on a turnout, but the driver, thinking there was some delay, started on. There is a sharp turn at this point, and a ledge obstructed the view. When the cars met beyond this, they were running at such speed that it was impossible to stop in time to prevent the collision.

At the republican caucus at Danvers Wednesday evening, the delegates elected for the senatorial convention were solid for Malcolm Sillars. It is said, the northern end of the District is strongly in favor of Capt. Sillars.

The following officers were chosen at the 16th annual meeting of the Veteran Odd Fellow's Association on Tuesday at Marblehead: Chief veteran, G. H. Stickney of Salem; vice veteran, A. C. Moody, Lynn; secretary, John Conway of Marblehead; treasurer, Moses H. Sibley, Salem; chaplain, G. J. Sanger, Essex; directors, Daniel Hook Haverhill; G. W. Kingsley; George Arvedson, Salem; Dwyer S. Hall, Hall, Lawrence; John Lloyd, Gloucester; E. Garrison, Newburyport; Samuel Luscomb, Lynn; Samuel Tapley, Methuen; J. D. Drew, Lawrence; J. J. Dennis, Beverly; D. R. Tenney, Haverhill.

The Ipswich fire department had their parade on Monday, in spite of the rain, illustrating the well known fact that firemen are not merely fairweather men. Visiting companies were present from Beverly, Georgetown, Revere, and Portsmouth. The local companies turned out in strong numbers, with the Ipswich Cornet Band. Dinners were served by the Women's Relief Corps. Steamer Enterprise of Beverly gave a good exhibition, and the local companies did grand work, the Torrent throwing 152 feet 3 inches the Neptune 146 feet 9 inches, the Warren 140 feet 2 inches, and the Barbicoot 132 feet 8 inches.

Among this week's patents are the following: Edwin W. Barton, Lawrence, contraction core for paper rolls; Charles W. Glidden, Lynn, rotary cutter for leather trimming machines; Geo. Hardy, Lawrence, car coupling; Ger. McPherson, Lynn, lasting machine.

A fund for the erection of a monument to the memory of James Higgins, who lost his life a few days since while attempting to rescue young George Ellis from drowning in Lake Gardner, has been started and a generous response from the citizens of Amesbury is assured.

The Kimball family will hold its reunion at Manchester-by-the-Sea on Tuesday, Sept. 29.

The 21st annual reunion of the 23d Regiment Association will be held on Thursday, September 25, at Marblehead. The business meeting will be held at 11 o'clock A. M. in G. A. R. hall, and dinner will be served at 1 P. M. in the Bay View Club house Goodwin's Head. Music will be furnished by the Salem Brass Band.

The Beverly Yacht Club sailed its 179th race and first open regatta off Monument Beach on Monday afternoon in a regular northeasterly gale and rain storm. Four boats in each of the 2d and 3d class were the only ones to make the start. The winners were the De fiance and the Anonyma in the 2d class, and the Patrol and the Puzzle in the 3d.

Mayor Andrews, of Gloucester, has received a letter from acting Secretary of the Navy James R. Soley, in reply to the Mayor's letter requesting the presence of the White Squadron in the harbor of the city during the celebration in 1892 of its two hundred fiftieth anniversary. The Secretary says: "Although it is impossible to say so long a time in advance what disposition can be made of any given ships, yet in view of the fact that the city of Gloucester and the adjoining coast have for many years been the source of supply of some of the best seamanship in the United States Navy, and the department can assure you that such co-operation in the celebration as is consistent with the interests of the public service will gladly be given."

NEWS SUMMARY.

The outlook for Lt. Peary and his company of Arctic explorers is not by any means flattering. Some fears are entertained that, being laid up by his recent mishap, his party may become disorganized and neglect to make necessary provisions for the siege of cold weather they must encounter. Birds are now migrating to the South, and advantage of the opportunity should be taken to secure as many as possible. Relief expeditions will be fitted out next spring to assist the explorers.

The people's party held its state convention at Boston Monday and nominated Henry Winn of Maiden for Governor; William J. Shields of Boston, Lieut. Governor; Joseph D. Cedic of Westfield, Secretary of the State; Thomas A. Watson of Braintree, Treasurer; William O. Wakefield of Lynn, Auditor; and Israel W. Andrews of Danvers, Attorney General.

The will of the late James M. Brown of Salem, bequeaths $1000 to the Odd Fellows Home, Worcester, and $500 to Essex Lodge, I. O. O. F. of Salem.

The Lakeside Home for little children, the summer resort of the hospital for sick children, erected on the Island opposite Toronto, by J. Ross Robertson, at a cost of $25,000, was formally presented to the trustees on Monday before a large assemblage of citizens. Professor Goldwin Smith delivered an oration in reply to the presentation.

The town of Weare, N. H., receives $2000 by the will of Phineas J. Stone, for the benefit of the worthy poor.

Ex-Gov. Berry of New Hampshire has observed his 95th birthday.

Gen. John Eaton, Ex-U. S. Commissioner of education and ex-president of Marietta College is named for the presidency of the New Hampshire Agricultural College after it shall have been removed to Durham.

Terrible earthquakes destroying whole townships occurred in San Salvador on Wednesday.

Two suicides occurred at Niagara Falls, Wednesday within the short space of two hours. The first victim was a woman who threw herself into the rapids above the Islands, the second, a young man who jumped from the bridge on Luna Island and was carried over the precipice in a trice.

It is not impossible that the Supreme Court will re-open the Concord railroad case.

The Coroner's Jury found that the iron columns supporting the collapsed building in Park Place, New York, were too weak for the weight put upon them. Some of the jury thought a gas explosion caused the collapse, but the former is the gist of the finding.

There will be trotting and running races at Mystic Park the 29 inst.

A riot has occurred at Ichang, China, and an establishment of American missionaries destroyed. More war vessels have been ordered to cruise in Chinese waters.

The Manhattan Athletic Club has prepared a list of sports, including bicycling and an aquatic tournament, as a welcome to the European Athletic ten to take place on Manhattan Field next Saturday, commencing at 1 o'clock.

He Kept Posted.

Not long since, a man with coat-tails flying scamped over the gang-plank of the Fall River boat just as it was cast off from the dock at New York. He was reeking with perspiration and covered with dust, but a look of sublime satisfaction illumined his countenance as he remarked to the purser between spasms to catch his breath:

"I tell you I keep posted! I'm never left. A second is as good as an hour to a busy man who keeps his head level. I'm always in it and I always get there because I don't lose my head. I am never left by boat or train because I know what I'm about—what time do we reach Albany?"

It took two waiters to show the man who was "posted" to his state room as the purser remarked that the boat was on time for Fall River and he could get to Albany from Boston by cars early the next afternoon.

Any Article that has outlived 22 years of competition and imitation, and sells more and more each year, must have merit. Dobbins' Electric Soap, first made in 1869, is just that article. Those who use it each week, (and their name is legion,) save clothes and strength, and let soap do the work. All that we can say as to its merits, pales into nothingness, before the story it will tell, itself, of its own perfect purity and quality, if you will give it one trial. Ask your grocer for it. He has it, or will get it. Try it next Monday.

There are many imitations. N. B. Electric Soaps in which electricity plays no part. Dobbins' is the original one, all Magnetics, Electrics, and Electro-Magnetics are fraudulent imitations. Ask for Dobbins' Electric, see that our name is on every wrapper, and if any other is sent you by your grocer, when you order ours, send it back to him.

Dyspepsia

Makes the lives of many people miserable, causing distress after eating, sour stomach, sick headache, heartburn, loss of appetite, a faint, "all gone" feeling, bad taste, coated tongue, and irregularity of the bowels. Dyspepsia does not get well of itself. It requires careful attention, and a remedy like Hood's Sarsaparilla, which acts gently, yet efficiently. It tones the stomach, regulates the digestion, creates a good appetite, banishes headache, and refreshes the mind.

Sick Headache
"I have been troubled with dyspepsia. I had but little appetite, and what I did eat distressed me, or did me little good. After eating I would have a faint or tired, all-gone feeling, as though I had not eaten anything. My trouble was aggravated by my business, painting. Last spring I took Hood's Sarsaparilla, which did me an immense amount of good. It gave me an appetite, and my food relished and satisfied the craving I had previously experienced." GEORGE A. PAGE, Watertown, Mass.

Heartburn

LOCAL LINES.

The Assessors have been distributing the street lists of assessed polls this week. The book is in more complete form than the one published last year, giving the residence upon the first of May 1890 the age, occupation and street number. Last year nothing was given but name of the polls arranged under headings showing upon what street they resided. The new form will make the book a valuable aid to the Registrars of voters as well as politicians. Those who fail to find their names upon the list can be assessed upon Wednesday the 23d and 30th from 2 to 4 o'clock P. M., or on Thursday, Oct. 1, from 2 to 4 or 7 to 10 P. M. at town hall.

William H. Crowley, the one armed man, well known in town, and a resident of Prospect street, Salem, fell in an epileptic fit in front of the ticket office of the stone depot, Salem, on Labor Day, striking with such force as to fracture the occipital. He was taken to the Salem hospital where he soon died. He was about 36 years of age. He was naturally bright and intelligent, a very interesting conversationalist, and had a host of friends among the most respected classes, notwithstanding his incurable habits of inebriety, which at times led him to assume the garb and general appearances of a tramp. Until a few months ago his drinking habits were periodical and in his sober intervals he presented an appearance of neatness, and engaged in business, generally canvassing. He has represented most of the well known publishing houses of Boston and Providence, and has also represented other lines of business, including portrait copying, upon the road. Everything has been done for him by his friends to save him from the county house and in the attempt to reclaim him from his habits, but the latter has been unavailing.

A Delightful Drive.

The delightful drive from Beach Bluff to Salem, by way of Peabody, is attracting more travel every year. It is so entirely different from the other roads in the vicinity that one is almost persuaded that he has left the seashore behind and is traveling through the mountains. The road runs through the woods most of the way, and is a winding up-hill grade until the Salem road is reached. Just before this, however, a glance backward makes a person who has traveled abroad think that he is in Scotland again, as the country below is a most perfect representation of the beautiful valley of the Trossach, in which the scene of Scott's famous poem, "The Lady of the Lake," is laid. An oil painting of this landscape is said to have completely deceived many persons who considered themselves very familiar with the Trossach's valley, and the similarity is pronounced remarkable.—Lynn Item.

WORLD'S FAIR NOTES.

Siam has decided to make an exhibit at Chicago, which shall eclipse the one it made at the Paris exposition, where it carried off the honors in the oriental section.

The suggestion made by prominent members of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution and of the Sons of the Sons of the Revolution, that October 11th should be celebrated throughout the world, as the Fourth of July is celebrated in the United States, is meeting with general approval.

Welshmen will hold an eisteddfod in Chicago at some time during the Exposition, a dispensation permitting them to do so having been granted by the National Association, which met recently at Swansea, Wales.

The publishers of Puck the well known comic paper, have been granted space, 50 by 100 feet, for a building on the Exposition grounds, in which to show fully every detail of the process of editing and publishing a humorous paper.

Henry B. Worthington has offered to furnish the Exposition, free of charge, pumps with a capacity of 40,000,000 gallons of water a day.

More than $150,000 was paid into the Exposition treasury, on stock subscriptions, on August 31, and for a week or more previous the receipts ran from $50,000 to $75,000 daily.

The first cotton gin, made by Eli Whitney, will be exhibited at the Exposition by the New Orleans Machinery Company, which will also make an extensive exhibit of cotton gins, sugar mills and other machinery.

Among the exhibits from Southern California will be a model constructed to illustrate irrigation. A committee has already been chosen to prepare it.

A genius at Muhlenberg, Pa., has completed a marvelous clock for exhibition at the Fair. Around the dial is a railway track, on which a miniature locomotive makes the round every five minutes. It requires a magnifying glass to see the delicate machinery. The oil cups at the journals are so small that nothing larger than a hair can be inserted. There is a headlight and bell, flag-holders on the pilot, whistle, and everything connected with a locomotive. It has a link motion under the engine to reverse it. The weight of the locomotive is 1 1-4 pounds, and it has been named "The Gem."

The owner of a brownstone quarry in Wisconsin has offered to the State commission for exhibition at the Fair, a solid monolith, larger than Cleopatra's needle in New York City. The obelisk, when completed will weigh 400 tons and be the largest mass of brownstone ever quarried.

Mrs. Potter Palmer has called upon women sculptors to send designs in the form of miniature models of the sculpture work for the women's building. The designs must be delivered to Mrs. Palmer's office before Nov. 15 next.

The preparation of Colorado's exhibit is progressing energetically. Besides the mineral, agricultural and educational exhibits, the flora and fauna of the state will be shown in great completeness. Already more than 1,000 specimens of plants have been pressed; nearly 200 varieties of fruit have been duplicated perfectly in wax, and more than 2,000 species of insects have been mounted.

The Texas World's Fair Exhibit Association is pushing, with great energy, the work of collecting funds for the state's representation at Chicago. The sum desired is $300,000, and this has been assessed among the 245 counties as nearly as possible, according to population, on a basis of fifteen cents per capita.

A magnificent microscope has just been completed by the Munich Pöcher Physical and Optical Institute for the great Chicago Exposition, at a cost of $8,750. It possesses a magnifying power of 11,000 diameters.

Grant Did Not Like Potatoes.

When there is any unusual event in an interior town the hotel keeper is forced to hire additional help for the dining room. This additional help is not always selected on account of peculiar fitness for the job. He may have been driving spikes in railroad ties.

Not long ago a statue of General Grant was unveiled in Glena. The town was crowded and so were the hotels. At the dinner table of one of the latter places there was a new waiter. The guest in question had observed several dishes and had been informed as he named each that "it was just me."

"Bring me some potatoes." The new waiter went with the order and returned without the article asked for. Fearful that the guest might get furious over repeated statements of "just out!" the waiter said, as he felt of his chin, "Mebbe ye know, sor, that this is General Grant day in Glena, and the General niver ate any praties, sor, and it would not do to hev 'em, ye know, on this occasion."—Chicago Tribune.

He Couldn't Make Them Die.

Census Superintendent Porter has received this unusually interesting report from an enumerator at St. Albans, Vt.:

I have your favor of the 19th inst., informing me of the dissatisfaction of your department with my mortality reports, and that it was unreasonable to suppose that in a district containing 1810 persons there should be but six deaths during the last five months of the census year; that according to some laws of average, hitherto unknown, and, therefore, unheeded, by the good people of my district, there should have been 10 deaths rather than 6 during the period indicated.

I am very sorry that my conscience prevents my reporting to you more deaths than were actually reported to me, for I inquired in every house, and you have already had the result. I studied your instructions very carefully, and found nothing in them to indicate that you expected 10 deaths in my district in order to make the census complete. Of course, had I known that the safety of my country's institutions demanded 10 deaths, I might have taken means to have obtained them, for I know several good subjects for pleasant funerals, all of said subjects being men whose deaths I would have recorded with much pleasure.

"But pardon me for calling attention to a seeming inconsistency in your law of average as applied even to the different districts of this town. In Mr. Barney F. Kelly's district (No. 110, St. Albans) there were about 1900 persons and 20 deaths. Now, from your letter, I understand you require one dead person for each 181 live ones, but he returned one dead one for each 95 live ones. Now, this number being so much in excess of the average indicated, will it be required to resurrect enough to bring it down where it belongs?"

"But possibly, if you knew my district, you would not presume to apply to it the rule indicated. In the first place, I have it from good authority that there is but one place in the world where the rate of mortality is as low as in St. Albans, and that place is far away in sunny Italy, but those people being ignorant and beyond our jurisdiction, we can hardly expect them to die according to the rules of the census department.

"My district contains a large number of persons who for pluck, patience and perseverance are the wonder and admiration of the age. I refer of course, to Vermont Democrats, who, you must know, occasionally grow old, but never die. There are a few government office-holders, and you know that dying is not one of their peculiarities, but had I received your instructions previous to the last election, and if they felt anyway as I did when the returns were coming in, I think I might have persuaded some of the newly appointed ones to die, with little difficulty."

"There are also a few school teachers, but presiding as they have so long over that band of angelic beings whose bright abodes are in the pleasant homes of St. Albans, they are not yet prepared to run the risk of being compelled to take positions in the sulphurous 'beyond the veil' where the reigning spirits have as little comprehension of a good school law as the Vermont Legislature."

"There are some lawyers to whom if the angel of death were to appear, with his sword already drawn, they would calmly ask for his credentials, and finally, when their last breath had departed, they would insist upon proof of their own death."

"There are, too, some physicians of excellent standing, but their operations have been confined to Mr. Kelly's district; where the death rate is so high, and, never having taken any of their own medicine, of course I have derived no assistance from this source in seeking victims."

"There are also some merchants, but they have been so busily engaged in marking up their goods in anticipation of the imagined effects of the McKinley bill that they haven't died, but they would probably have done so had they known it would accommodate anybody, particularly the census enumerators, who are very popular."

"There are several clergymen, a few deacons, some stewards, an Episcopal vestry and a couple of Sunday school superintendents, but, of course, none of these dare to die."

There are some editors, called by some 'uncrowned kings of thought.' It is an old adage, you know, 'uneasy lies the head that wears a crown;' but, being uncrowned, editors generally lie so extremely easy that I would not feel justified in reporting them as dead upon their own testimony alone.

"There are some plumbers, but it would be a great disadvantage to them to be compelled to depart for that portion of the undiscovered country where, owing to the intense heat of the climate solder ever remains in a liquid state."

As for the rest of the people, I can only say that, if you were ever to visit my section of this beautiful village, you would see at once how hard it would be to entice them into any other country hereafter, no matter how fair its fields, how blue its skies, how golden its streets, how happy its inhabitants.

"But I am aware that your department likes condensed official reports; hence I must hasten to close this one, only trusting that you will regard this explanation of the small number of deaths in my district as satisfactory; but, while I am upon this subject of census, I may as well state that, while regretting exceedingly to sever the official relations existing between us, I shall not be a candidate for enumerator in 1900."

"I believe in passing these things around. Let others who have labored long and faithfully for Republican success share in the spoils. I know by the way in which my several reports have been received that you will be grieved at my resolution. I myself, though modest, am constrained to admit that my being no longer connected with the census department will be a serious loss to the country, but when I reflect that, if only four more persons had understood the rules and died, I should have been entitled to $43.91 for six weeks' work, the mystic chords of conscience, vibrating to the touch of patriotism, tell me to believing that I have been fed all that I deserve to be at the public crib."

A "standard" dollar contains about 412 1-2 grains of "standard" silver, but it contains only 271 1-4 grains of pure silver. This "dollar" is a very cheap affair, when measured by the generally accepted standard of the civilized world. This is not because it is made of silver, but because it contains too little silver. A good silver dollar, worth a hundred cents, would be an inconvenient and cumbersome coin to use, but it would be more acceptable.

him that he had done so, but he felt a little thrill of pride notwithstanding.
But what was done could not be undone.

"If I wasn't too old I'd go along with you," he said. "I'd like you and me to fight side by side. I wonder of they'd take me?"

"No, no, dad," said Reuben. "I'll be back soon."

"I shall pray for you," said old Spicer,
"but I dunno as I'm listened to." He was thinking of the prayers he had offered to heaven that his boy and he might never be parted. And it had all come to this. He knew why.

"Just a pretty little girl, and there's such lots of little girls," he thought;
"and he's only got one old dad, living on borrowed time, too, and fonder of him than words can tell, and he ain't nothin' to him compared with one little girl." But he bade his son godspeed, and waved his large red handkerchief to the regiment marched away, and stepped to the music a little himself, and whistled his way home, but his hair got whiter after that, and it was at breakfast time next morning that black Sally noticed for the first time that he was beginning to stoop.

As for Beulah, she had not been well since the night of the birthday party. Not well enough to see Mr. Du Bois when he called to say goodbye, and had been so gallant to her mother that the old lady stood before the mantel mirror for ten minutes after he had gone, and said to herself that she must be wonderfully well preserved for her age.

No, Beulah had not been well, but on this day mother and daughter had gone out for a ride together and had driven down toward what was called the landing, when they were aware of a steamboat lying there, the stars and stripes flying and a regiment marching on board of her.

The long line of boys in blue stretched up the street; the band played "The Girl I Left Behind Me."
The pony attached to the basket phaeton thought it respectful to stand on his hind legs and widen his nostrils, and a man who was watching the procession took him by the bridle and held him, soothing him by certain pats and whispers.

"Another lot of men off, I see," said Mrs. Barton.

"Yes," said the man, "there is Freeman Pennypacker and Rodman Calkindahl and Phineas Spot, and the youngest of 'em is Reuben Spicer, Grocer Spicer's boy. I see him stop to shake hands with his father just now. It's rough on the old man—rough. Like enough he won't see Reu again in this world."

It was just then that Beulah leaned back on the cushions. A little later her mother discovered that she had fainted.

CHAPTER II.

And taking a flask from his pocket put it to his lips.

Often after that Beulah as well as the squire's wife used to rise from her bed of moonlight nights and look toward the south. How many women did that in those days, I wonder, mothers and sisters and wives and sweethearts, all told—northern women and southern women whose hearts ached alike?

She used to put her palms together and lay her cheek upon them, after a pretty unconscious fashion that she had, and think that if ever Reuben came back she would try to make up with him. But she had very little hope that he would return. "I am punished for behaving as I did to the man I loved," she often said in confidence to Diana, "and I shall be punished more and more." And the pale huntress seemed to give her a cold smile of assent.

We do such odd, mad things when we are young and in love, especially if we are unhappy. I am sure that Mrs. Barton would have sent for the doctor to prescribe for poor Beulah if she had heard her talking to the moon in little, low murmurs, interspersed with soft sobs, but no one heard her and the habit grew.

"You are up there, so high above the world," she would say; "you can see Reuben. Ah, if you could tell me what you see!" And one night the silent moon could indeed have told her a thrilling tale, painted a strange picture.

Far to the southward her silver light flooded a battlefield red with blood. All day they had been fighting, the blue and the gray. No matter what they call the battle in history or how it ended we have only followed Reuben there for his love's sake. The fighting had been furious, gallant, on both sides; they were all Americans—the dark eyed, black haired, dashing soldiers of the south; the cool, strong, light haired, gray eyed northern men.

The fighting, orderly at first, had become a wild turmoil. The men were fighting hand to hand; officers whose horses had been killed under them were on foot, sword in hand, covered with blood, dust and gunpowder; hideous sights were to be seen everywhere;
wounded men, bleeding at every vein;
crippled horses struggling to rise; mounted men vainly striving to prevent their horses from falling on fallen comrades; dead men trampled forward in their saddles, borne into the thickest of the fray, their hands frozen to their sword hilts.

The setting sun was merely a red rim beyond the blackest westward woods

when Reuben almost stumbled over an officer in Confederate uniform lying on his back upon the ground. The next moment a mounted cavalryman dashed past and stooping low in his saddle struck at the poor wretch with his sword.
Reuben parried the blow with his gun.
The rider was gone, glad perhaps that he had not carried out his purpose, which was only a furious impulse of the moment, not the coldblooded and cruel thing it seems as it is written. But Reuben, who had a tender heart, could not leave his enemy there to be trampled upon, and began to drag him toward the nearest clump of trees, half way across the space that lay between. He heard the "ping" of a bullet, felt a pang in his left arm and did the rest of his work with his right.

As the two men fell together under the old pine the sun vanished, twilight fell. A retreat had begun. In ten minutes the great plain was deserted by all but the dead and dying. Even the wounded who were able to move had gotten away somehow. Reuben was not suffering much. His arm was numb; with his other he managed to place the Confederate officer in a sitting position, his back against the tree, and taking a flask from his pocket put it to his lips.
A faint voice lifted itself.

"Sir, you are very kind, but you may need that yourself," he said. "You also are wounded."

"Plenty for both," said Reuben. A little later, revived by the draught, the Confederate officer was binding Reuben's arm, shattered after the elbow.

"I am conscious, sir," he said, "that it was in aiding me you received this wound. You are a magnanimous enemy."

As he spoke a peculiar expression, the promise of a smile that was not fulfilled, passed over his mouth.

Reuben had seen it before; it awakened a memory, as a glance, a sound, a perfume often will. He was once more in Mrs. Barton's large dining room. He saw before him the table with its dishes of salad, its gold and silver cake, its macaroni pyramids, its shapes of cream and jelly. He saw the Mulberry belles in their evening dresses, the Mulberry beaux chattering, smiling, looking pleased with themselves, striving to please the ladies.

Beulah, in her blue dress with tea roses at her belt, so absorbed in the conversation of young Du Bois that she had no eyes for him, and everything else vanished, as everything does if one fixes one's eyes long enough upon some single star in the clear night sky. "Beulah, Beulah," he whispered. Then out of the mists came the smile that was so peculiar.

"Is your name Du Bois?" he asked.

"Yes," replied the other. "I have met you at the north; they entertained me most hospitably; I met charming people.
I am glad to—" He paused, his voice failed him, but he struggled to complete the sentence, "to meet you again." The knight of courtesy was faithful to the last.

Reuben sat silent. The moon was slowly rising, a great, silver disk in the sky. Afar in Reuben's native home Beulah saw her rise.

The white light flooded the great, stubbly field with all its ghastly relics of the battle, and the handsome face of Du Bois looked white as Parian marble. He spoke again, and his voice had altered strangely. His hands moved stiffly as he drew a ring from his finger.

"I—I shall not see my wife again," he said. "Poor darling, she'll break her heart. We love each other. Let—let me put this on your finger. Some day give her this and tell her I thought of her and the babies last of all. Tell her how good you were to me. Galveston, Texas, is our home."

Reuben could not see him for the tears that dimmed his eyes, but their hands met in a long, lingering clasp. And still the moon shone down upon them, riding her course, and Beulah watched it.

"Tell him I loved him all the while," she whispered. And he at the moment was saying to himself:

"Jealous fool that I was. He was a married man, who loved his wife, and Beulah must have known it. The poor fellow was gallant to all women. Well, I shall never see her again, or poor old dad either."

CHAPTER III.

And there in that back room the talk was long and sweet.

One day, as Mrs. Barton sat upon her porch crocheting together the strips of an afghan, Mr. Spicer opened the gate and came in. He had never done more than nod in passing. But now he strode up to the porch. His face was red and his eyes blazed.

"Where's your girl?" he asked roughly.

"Sally?" queried Mrs. Barton. "In the kitchen, I guess. Has she been doing anything out of the way?"

"I don't mean Sally, I mean your daughter," said old Spicer. He swayed a little as he stood there, and Mrs. Barton wondered if he could have been drinking.

"Well, I ain't used to hear Beulah asked for just exactly in that way, you know, Mr. Spicer," she said.

For answer, Spicer held toward her a letter and a newspaper that he clutched in his hand.

"Read them," he said.

"News from the seat of war," cried

Mrs. Barton. "Oh, Mr. Spicer, is it bad news?"

"My Reuben is dead, and your girl murdered him," cried the old man shrilly.
At this moment both saw Beulah standing in the doorway. She was trembling from head to foot.

"What does he mean, mother? What does he mean?" she cried.

"I guess he is out of his mind, child," said Mrs. Barton. "He's got bad news.
Sit down, Mr. Spicer, and let me get you a good cold drink. We've got to bear afflictions when they come."

"I'm not crazy, Mrs. Barton," said old Spicer. "I know what I'm saying, and your girl knows what I mean. You did it at your birthday party. I don't know what you did, but he went to it happy and hopeful, meaning to ask you to be his wife, I guess. My Reuben wasn't a boy to do that without encouragement, and when he came back I didn't know him.
No, I didn't know him; he was so altered, broke down, wretched, desperate. You drove him away. You thought yourself above him, I suppose. You're not! You're not! My Reu was any girl's equal."

And then that absurd speech of hers about people who had never been shopkeepers rushed into Beulah's mind, and,
to her mother's shocked astonishment, she sprang forward and threw her arms around old Spicer's neck.

"Say anything to me! I deserve it!"
she sobbed. "But I never meant to drive him away. I've cried over it many a long night. I didn't know he felt so.
I was angry because he did not come early. I thought he didn't care, and I loved him. I loved him as well as you did— Oh, Reuben, Reuben, Reuben!"

The old man sat down upon one of the red chairs with which the porch was furnished, and Beulah knelt down beside him, and they wept together like two children for their lost dear one.

That year, for the first time, Mrs. Barton did not give her girl a birthday party. Beulah was very ill on that anniversary, and though she did not die, she settled down into an invalid—one of those interesting persons who exist in every village, to whom people take jelly and flowers and religious books, and of whose case the doctors find it impossible to give a diagnosis.

It was a great trial for Mrs. Barton, who was a spirited person, and who finally became not so sorry for her daughter as angry with her.

"Of course Reuben Spicer was a very nice young man," she said to herself,
"and I dunno as I should have objected;
but widders marry again in a couple of years sometimes, and I feel as if Beulah needn't carry on so long."

And when August came and Maryland peaches were ripe and stood in big baskets at Mr. Spicer's door, Mrs.
Barton, thinner and sharper of feature than of yore, but still as neatly coiffed and collared and coiffured as ever, stood beside the couch on which Beulah lay propped up by pillows, and said slowly and decisively:

"The last birthday party you had, Beulah Barton, was in sixty-one. Two years I've skipped it. 'This year I'm goin' to give you one.'"

"Mother!" cried Beulah.

"I be," said Mrs. Barton, who, whenever she wished to be impressive, returned to Yankee dialect.

"Mother!" repeated Beulah, "when you know I'm dying of a broken heart."

"I didn't know no sech thing, Beulah Barton," said her mother; "anyhow you air actin' rebellious, and blessin's never follow that sort of thing. The Lord's will has got to be done, August the fifth sees you havin' a birthday party, and you're goin' to set up to it if I hev to carry you down stairs pig-a-back."
Hear?

"Yes, ma'am," said Beulah, closing her eyes.

"Very well, you kin look over them samples and see what I shall get for you a dress," said Mrs. Barton, laying a great envelope on the afghan that covered Beulah as she reposed on the couch,
"and choose a proper nice patron, do."

"Mother, you're talking dreadfully Yankee," said the girl. "I wish you wouldn't."

But Mrs. Barton had left her alone, and after awhile she opened the envelope and found within a bunch of silk samples and a little fashion magazine, and shortly grew interested, and finally, when her tea was ready, pronounced with a sigh in favor of heliotrope color and white lace flounces.

Old Mr. Spicer was taking his dinner in the little back room while his boy watched the shop.

Meal times were sad affairs in these days. Ghosts were with him then. He used to fancy that he heard Reuben run lightly down stairs and up to the very door of the room, and lift his head half expecting to see him enter and to discover that he had been dreaming a bad dream.

Today this had happened half a dozen times, when the lad put his head in at the door of the room.

"What is it, John?" asked the old man.
"Well, Mr. Spicer, them there Maryland peaches is goin' faster'n you'd like, that's all."

"I suppose you're afraid to chase the boys away? You ain't got no more spunk than a hen," said old Spicer.

He arose, stalked through the back room and out upon the porch in haste, but there stood still. It was not a boy who was stealing peaches out of his baskets, but a soldier. Thin as a skeleton, his shoes like those of a tramp, everything he wore falling from him in rags, and the left sleeve of his wretched jacket pinned empty to his breast, he sat there eating peaches as coolly as if they belonged to him.

"Making free, you see," he said. "I couldn't help it if I was to be shot for it.
You'd have to live on moldy crusts as I have, to know how these peaches taste to me."

"Help yourself," said old Spicer tremulously. "I'm glad to see any of the boys in blue for the sake of one I had that marched away and won't never march back again."

"You can't be sure of that," said the soldier, without looking up.

SALEM, September 12, 1891.

Fall Tailoring—

We are quite ready for the fall business, and the fall business is already beginning to come to us.

The goods are here. Beyond doubt not only a larger, but a choicer line of suitings, trouserings and both light and heavy weight overcoatings, than is or will be shown elsewhere.

All the most fashionable browns and tans, as well as all manner of black cloths, and some rare novelties. The very best of Scotch, English and fine American fabrics all.

Our work is known the county through to be of the highest order; correct as to style, perfect as to fit, thorough as to workmanship. Prices low for this class of work.

There is still a large assortment of good styles of last fall's cloths which we continue to make up into fine business suits at $25 and $30.

And trousers at $5 to $10. Mr. P. J. Conree and Robt. T. Almy will give their personal attention to all customers.

Stairway at 194 Essex street. Open all evenings but Thursday during the busy season.

Preserving season is at its highest now. Sugar cheap; fruit and berries plenty. Never was so much preserving done.

Of kettles—Our steel enamelled ware is the best wear in the world for the purpose.

Next best is porcelain lined iron.

Tin is a third choice.

Our stocks of all are bountiful, and prices are down with the lowest.

LITERARY NOTES.

The Season for October is just out, and is full of beautiful Autumn designs in dress and art work. Plate 896 has a delightful representation of a visiting costume for evening calls; also a morning dress with long jacket bodice. Plate 897 gives a rich silk dress covered with Chantilly lace; also a handsome foulard with several very new ideas combined in their construction. Plate 898 gives two illustrations, which we consider the very best designs we have seen this season—one is a re-union costume, the other a morning dress. These costumes alone are inducements seldom offered to the public, and should be secured by every lady desiring to present a handsome appearance. There is a great variety of garments displayed in this book, and all of the most recherche kind. Ladies in mourning will find a great variety of appropriate designs to select from, while garments are so successfully portrayed. Millinery, jewelry, and ornamental pins and combs, fans and negligé garments are carefully portrayed. Children's garments are many and varied, and all of the newest and latest designs for pretty home decorations are wonderfully portrayed and so illustrated as to make the reproduction of them a pleasure. Ladies should secure this month's Season without delay, and we feel assured they will never willingly be without it. All the articles shown from month to month can be depended on as originals—not simply copies from other periodicals—thus making them more valuable. Single copies, 30 cents. Yearly subscription, $3.50. The International News Company, 83 & 85 Duane street, New York.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper for the week ending September 12th, has striking illustrations of the fire at Jacksonville, Fla., and the terrible railroad accident in North Carolina. It has also a page of illustrations accompanied by a copious descriptive article concerning the Prince of the Red Desert; a tale of Australian Discovery. Other features are a group of prominent jockeys of the year and a page illustrating market night in the Jewish quarter of New York.

Rudyard Kipling's novel, written in collaboration with Wolcott Balestier for the Century is entitled The Naulahka, a Tale of the West and East. It is a story of America and India. The principal characters live in a "booming" Colorado town, where the story opens, but the scene quickly shifts to the court of an Indian maharajah, whither the hero and the heroine journey to meet the most varied experiences. The story will begin in the November Century.

Mrs. Burton Harrison, the author of The Anglomaniacs, has written a new novel of New York life which the Century will print. It is said to deal with divorce.

The Arena for September is as usual fully abreast with the advanced thought of the times. The paper which probably attracts most attention, owing to its timely appearance is Fashion's Slaves, a profusely illustrated contribution on woman's dress reform by the editor. We do not know whether or not Mr. Flower had been reformed of the proposed dress reform movement at Chautauqua, which has attracted such general notice by virtue of the radical position taken by its leaders and the encouragement given the move by such leading women as Miss Francis E. Willard and Mrs. Frances E. Russell, but he certainly scores another palpable hit in the timely appearance of this paper. Among the many other noteworthy contributions are the Rev. George C. Lorimer's defence of Dr. Briggs and his associates; Frederic W. H. Meyer of Cambridge, England, on the work accomplished by the English Physical Society. The Arena has made for itself the foremost place as the review of advanced and progressive thought.

There is now so considerable public interest in the many practical applications of electricity—that wonderful something that has come in the latter half of the nineteenth century to play its important part in our every day life—that a popular treatment of the subject, such as can be read by the everyday man, whether electrician or not, is just at present doubly welcome. We are therefore pleased to see the current issue of The Electrical World, that Dr. Louis Bell, the editor of that journal, has begun a series of timely and important articles on the Elements of Practical Electricity, written in plain and simple language for beginners. The author's idea is, apparently, to brush aside, so far as possible, the conventional methods of discussing that many consider a complicated subject and to come directly to the substance of it by beginning it in a practical way and continuing in that course to the very end. He has therefore commenced the subject by taking up the great discoveries of Volta and his contemporaries that really furnish the basis of modern electricity. Up to about the beginning of the present century, there was no available way of getting electrical energy in sufficient quantity to utilize for anything more than small experiments. With the invention of the voltaic pile and the voltaic battery, clearly described and illustrated in Dr. Bell's first paper, in The Electrical World of September 5th, the scientific world was put in possession of a source of electricity considerable enough to encourage practical applications. The author of these papers is evidently one who believes in experimental methods, for in intimate connection with the statement of facts may be found carefully selected experiments, with the working details clearly given, so that they can be readily performed even by those of no previous experience or acquaintance with electrical matters. The articles are well illustrated and give promise of filling up a gap that has existed between popular and rather elementary books and more scientific and forbiddingly mathematical treatises. All classes of intelligent readers can follow the subject as Dr. Bell treats it, and doubtless many a young man will find these articles the starting point of his electrical education. The Electrical World is the pioneer American journal of its class, and the largest in the world. The subscription is $3 per year which includes postage. Newsdealers supply it at an expense of 10 cents a week. The publishers are the W. J. Johnston, Ltd., 167-177 Times Building, New York. The articles of Dr. Bell will run for several months. Those subscribing now will have the series complete.

As the sun is superior to the stars, so DANA'S is superior to all other Sarsaparillas.

We have received the September of Goldthwaite's Geographical Magazine, and a remarkably interesting number it is. It treats solely on geographical subjects but in such a manner as to be interesting to the general reader as well as to the teacher, to whom it is of special interest. The articles on the Caverns of Luray, Soro, the Danish Eton, snowed out Ruwenzori and Kong, the long mysterious city, are well illustrated. This book should be in the hands of all teachers. The Goldthwaite's, 130 Fulton street, N. Y., are the publishers, and the price is two dollars a year. Single copies 25 cents.

What Does It Mean?

"100 Doses One Dollar means simply that Hood's Sarsaparilla is the most economical medicine to buy, because it gives more for the money than any other preparation. Each bottle contains 100 doses and will average to last a month, while other preparations, taken according to directions, are gone in a week. Therefore, be sure to get Hood's Sarsaparilla, the best blood purifier.

Attention! Everybody!!

Do you love a cool and refreshing drink of Soda or Moxie? If you do, call for one of Stevens' Best. We can furnish you six days in the week, but on the seventh you will have to go dry. We have at our store all of the stations of both electric and horse cars running in and out of Peabody; but on the seventh day, or Sunday, you will be obliged to stand out of door in the heat or the rain as the case might be, as we have had a notice served on us by the so-called Law and Order League of Peabody, denying us the right to sell Soda, Confectionery, Cigars or Tobacco on that day. Therefore, we were obliged to close as we could not furnish, could not keep open.

GOD BLESS PEABODY!!

She needs it! 10,000 inhabitants and not a hotel or public house in the place! No inducements for strangers to visit us! No wonder our business is dull! No wonder our factories lay idle, our tanneries shut up and all business at a standstill! What we want is liberal sentiment and not littleness of mind! Then we shall grow and prosper as other Towns round about us.

Don't think we are losing courage at this state of affairs. We hope to see them righted and to live to see the good old Town once more redeemed and made prosperous as in the days gone by.

We have a large and fine stock of goods in our store, and we shall try to sell you as cheap as elsewhere. All fruits in their season. Choice Cigars, Confectionery, Tobacco and a thousand things too numerous to mention.

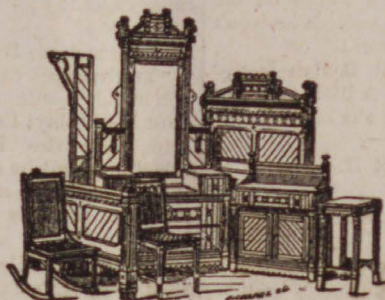

Will try to give you a lunch as well as we know how. Polite clerks always in attendance.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.BOSTON THEATRE.

The 37th anniversary of the opening of Boston Theatre occurred this week, with Denman Thompson as the figure of attraction, in the "Old Homestead." Matinees will be held Wednesday and Saturdays during the continuance of the engagement.

PARK THEATRE.

Nell Burgess has formally opened the season at the Park with the laughable comedy, "County Fair." Saturday matinees will be given at 2 o'clock. The attraction will continue during the season.

TREMONT THEATRE.

Next Monday begins the third regular season of the Tremont Theatre and the attraction, an indubitably great one, will be Chas. H. Hoyt's ablest work, "A Texas Steer." It is hardly necessary to allude to the fact that in this play Mr. Hoyt has made his first distinct departure from the line of plays in which he has made his earliest, and up to the time of the production of "A Texas Steer," his greatest successes, namely the so-called farce-comedy. "A Texas Steer," has nothing of the farce-comedy (a misleading term anyhow) in it; it is thorough comedy and admirable satire. Mr. Hoyt has shown admirable judgment and fairness in his treatment of politics, avoiding very skillfully any partisanship, and using his bright pen in attacking faults, to use a mild term, not incident to, or the custom of, any particular party or class. General and common foibles of the political genera, rather than specific failings. Nevertheless the shafts of satire are so bright and keen that they pierce the armor of indifference so commonly worn by political leadership, and teach the public a generous lesson. "A Texas Steer" is, with its excellent methods and lessons, moreover, a play abounding in fun, and few moments of its time of presentation are without the accompaniment of hearty laughter. The same admirable company which made so great and good an impression last season will have the interpretation of "A Texas Steer" this year, including, especially, Miss Flora Walsh and Mr. Tim Murphy and success equal to its first presentations here is certain to attend "A Texas Steer's" second season at the Tremont.

After the current week, the only regular matinees at the Tremont Theatre will be given on Saturdays.—The final Wednesday matinee occurred Sept. 9th, with Miss Rice in "A Jolly Surprise."

GRAND OPERA HOUSE.

Walter Sanford's "My Jack" closes at the Grand Opera House tonight. Monday Annie Ward Tiffany will occupy the boards.

HOLLIS STREET THEATRE.

The amazing sensation, "Blue Jeans," with a superb cast, fine scenery and effects, draws immense houses. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday afternoons.

"The Power of the Press" is the attraction at the Globe Theatre.

"Ye Earlie Trouble" continues to draw large houses at the Museum.

Julia Marlowe made a decided success as Imogen, in "Cymbeline," at Providence, Thursday evening. She was recalled in every act. A large representation from Boston and New York was present.

Sorting and Cleaning Wool.

The wool comes into the mill dirty, greasy, burry, sometimes washed by the farmer, but generally just as it is sheared from the sheep, a filthy and unwholesome thing, giving little sign of the beautiful, white and lustrous substances into which it is soon converted. It must first be sorted, each fleece containing from six to eight qualities of sorts, which the careful manufacturer separates, devoting each quality to the purpose for which it is best suited. No skill in carding, spinning, weaving or finishing can possibly produce a soft or a fine piece of goods from a coarse, hard fiber.

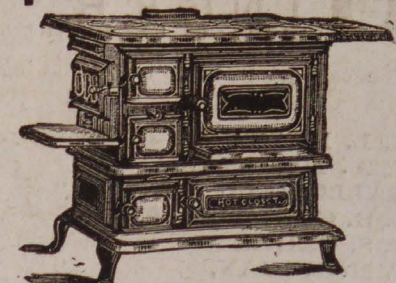

When a woolen thread is to be spun to the length of 15,360 yards to a pound, or in the case of a worsted thread to twice that number of yards to the pound, everything depends upon care in the selection of the fleece, and in the sorting. The sorts are impregnated with a greasy substance called the yolk or suint, caused by the animal secretions and the perspiration of the skin, a compound of potash and animal fat, which must be completely eradicated. The elimination of the yolk, dirt and foreign substances common to all wools, results in a shrinkage of from fifty to seventy per cent.—S. N. D. North, in Popular Science Monthly.

A Serious Accident to the Local Lamp-Lighter.

Last Saturday evening shortly after 7 o'clock as the electric cars were coming down Wallis street, Maurice Flynn, who is employed under Lamplighter Daley to assist in lighting the street lamps, drove his team up to light the lamp at the entrance of Monumental Cemetery, directly opposite Elm street and was struck by and approaching car.

There were two cars coming down the street, near each other, car number 11 on which is the 45 horse-power, Rae motor being in the rear. The motor-neer was sounding his gong lustily, which was heard by the lamplighter, who evidently mistook the sound for the gong on the forward car, which had already passed the point where he was lighting the lamp. However this may be, despite the warning signal, he put himself between two cars, and was not seen by the motor-neer on the car, until too near to avoid a catastrophe although the headlight was burning brightly.

As soon as Mr. Town, who was running the car, saw the wagon, he applied the brakes with all his strength but was unable to overcome the inertia entirely, and the car struck the vehicle squarely, with force enough to throw Mr. Flynn off the box and demolish the wagon. The unfortunate man was thrown against an iron hydrant and lay prostrate, groaning and apparently unconscious upon the ground.

Mr. Daley, who meets his assistant at that point came along, and the injured man was tenderly placed upon the car and brought to the Square, where a hack was procured which conveyed him to his home. Dr. Shanahan was called and found the man suffering great pain, but was unable to discover any injuries of a serious nature, or even any bones broken.

The car was running at a very low speed at the time of the discovery of danger, according to testimony of passengers and disinterested bystanders, but being very heavy on a down grade, the momentum was hard to check in an instant. The car stopped as soon as it struck, which is an indication that reports as to low speed are correct.

The horse, was entirely uninjured by the shock.

Wild stories filled the air Saturday evening which were soon dissipated after the medical diagnosis.

The Tennis Tournament.

On Saturday afternoon, between two and three hundred people witnessed the Essex County lawn tennis tournament on the Wright and Peabody Club grounds in the rear of Warren street, which was played by postponement from Labor Day, the rain on that occasion preventing the fulfillment of previous arrangements. The exhibition was very interesting and highly creditable to the participants and the feats of Ray Driver and O. A. Reed were particularly clever. The preliminaries were played earlier in the week.

The matches stood as follows:

PRELIMINARIES.
Boynden beat Shepard 6-1 7-5

CABINETS

$4.00

PER DOZ.

Our price has always been $5.00 without deviation; and for two years we have done no club work.

We shall probably never sell clubs again, their day having gone by; but there are many who do not care during these dull times to pay so much as $5.00 a dozen for pictures, but who still want the best. As we wish to reach this class, but do not believe in charging two prices for the same thing, we have decided to adopt the medium price of $4.00 for a short time. The quality of work will be the same as heretofore.

ORIGINAL No. 26. Breakfast Fruit Cake

BY MARION HARLAND.

1 quart of flour, 2 cups of milk, 2 tablespoonfuls of butter, 1 tablespoonful of lard, 1 teaspoonful salt, 1 quart of strawberries, huckleberries, blackberries or raspberries, 1 cup of sugar, 2 teaspoonfuls of Cleveland's baking powder.

Sift flour, baking powder and salt together, chop in the shortening, stir in the milk with a wooden spoon. The dough should be just stiff enough to handle. Roll into two sheets, line a baking pan with one, put in the berries, strew with sugar, lay on the other sheet and bake. Cut into squares, split and eat hot with sugar and butter.

Use only Cleveland's baking powder, the proportions are made for that.

The leavening power of Cleveland's Baking Powder comes from cream of tartar with soda, nothing else; that is why Cleveland's is perfectly wholesome, and leavens best.

CHAPTER I.

She turned away, her eyes instinctively seeking the window opposite.

He was just vanishing over the brow of the hill when they came clattering along the dusty road. Heavens! Would the broomstraw hide his tall young form from their searching eyes? With her arms about her mother's waist Glen strained her own sight to watch him, while a sob rose in her throat. Maum Betsey, with her fat arms akimbo, stood at the corner of the house, alternately watching the disappearance of her oldest nursing and the rapid approach of a squad of cavalymen as they drew nearer and nearer in a cloud of dust.

"My Gawd! Miss Ma'y, it is de Yanks, sho' nuff," she gasped, with her eyes starting from her head. "I clart to grashus, dey's a stoppin', and dar's dat boy Nelse hangin' on to de front gate an' talkin' to 'em, like as ef his black hide 'ud tu'n a bullet. Wisht dey would pepper him onct, ennyhow. I'll give him Yankee Doodle when I gits holt o' him again, see ef I don't."

A new fear pierced the mother's heart. Were the soldiers about to enter this defenseless home? But no; after a brief consultation with Nelse the party wheeled across the road and entered a grove of live oaks just opposite the mansion.

Nelse hung on to the gate with outstretched neck and starting eyes until the last blue coat was out of sight, and then dropping off, sped like a bullet up the avenue and around the house into Maum Betsey's wrathful presence.

"Lawdy!" he panted, nimbly directing a cuff which she directed at his ear. "Is you seen dem Yanks, mammy?"

But before Maum Betsey's ire could burst forth, Glen left her mother's side and turned her stern young face inquiringly upon the boy.

"What did you tell those men, Nelse?" she asked.

"Lawdy! I ain't done tell 'em nuffin, Miss Glen. Hope I may die, ef I did. Dey ax an' axed me who lived here, an' I tole 'em jes you an' ole Miss, an' Missy—an' me an' mammy—since all dem yuther niggers done runned off."

"And what did they say then?"

Nelse writhed under her steady eye. "Den dey tuk an' axed me war dere no gen'l'men 'bout de place, an' I tole 'em ole marster he done tuk an' died fo' de wah—an'—an' dat was all."

"And you said nothing about your young master?"

"Lawdy, Miss Glen, I hope I may die ef I did," his black body twisting in emphatic denial. "You jes go an' ax 'em, ef you don't b'lieve me, you jes go an' ax 'em."

But Maum Betsey was no longer to be kept out of the conversation. "You look heah, nigger." She had managed in the heat of the discussion to grasp the wary Nelse by the shoulder and was pushing him before her to the kitchen doorway, near which they were standing. "You jes lemme ketch you hangin' on to dat front gate agin, proejekin' wid Yanks, will you? An' ef I heah a word out o' your black mouth 'bout Mars Frank gittin' away I'll skin you like a eel, boy. You heah me, don't you?"

As the pair disappeared Mrs. Helen lifted her anxious eyes to her daughter's face. "Glen, do you think he told them?" she whispered.

"I am afraid he did, dear, but mother, don't give up so. They must have learned it sooner or later. They have made no move as yet to search for him, and he is out of their reach now, or soon will be. He knows every foot of these woods and hills, and there are plenty of doors open to him. He will not lack for food and shelter. Besides, we can still communicate with him, and they will surely not be stationed long in this out of the way place. What a mercy he escaped them."

"But, oh, my child! think of the fearful outrages these straggling bands of soldiers have committed through the country. Oh, if I had but been wise enough to have sent you away, and kept only Missy with me!"

"Now, mother, listen. I am not afraid of a whole regiment of Yankees, and what in the world would you have done without me? You must come right in now and have a cup of tea and lie down, and if Missy's nap is out I'll bring her down to keep you company while I watch the movements of the blue coated gentry over in the grove a little and keep my eye on Nelse, for he'll slip through Maum Betsey's fingers like an eel, sure enough."

But when her mother had been comfortably established on the sitting room sofa with Missy, warm and rosy from her afternoon nap, chattering happily beside her, Glen's lighthearted show of fearlessness forsook her. Her anxiety took the form of restless wanderings over the house, whose every window commanding a view of the grove opposite, drew her in turn like a magnet.

It was a fine old house of red brick, standing well back from the high road, surrounded by clustering trees and approached by an avenue of magnificent cedars; but the grounds were no longer trim and well kept, and the numerous outbuildings were dilapidated and vacant. An air of neglect and loneliness, enhanced by its remote situation from any town or village, hung about the place, and its interior corresponded but too well with this external desolation.

There had evidently been but few modern additions to the household belongings in late years. The furniture was still handsome, but old and massive, and the brilliant hues of the Turkey carpets and the rich curtains had faded to sober and neutral tints. The bare floors in some of the rooms were actually more cheerful, for they were waxed and rubbed until they shone like mirrors, and when the fires were lighted in the open fireplaces the flames glistened upon shining oak and danced on the polished surface of old mahogany and multiplied themselves in the big brass andirons, that shone in rivalry of the brass candlesticks upon the high, old fashioned mantels.

As Glen wandered restlessly from room to room, her home seemed to wear a new and unfamiliar aspect to her startled eyes. Suppose it should be invaded? It had always been so sure and peaceful a haven. Remote and secluded, only the rumors of war had disturbed its inmates and the one member of the immediate family who had ever been called upon to yield to its demands had thus far been singularly preserved from danger. But its grim shadow had taken all the color out of the girl's life. All her opportunities had been sacrificed to it. Every promise of her opening girlhood had been blighted by it.

"You were to have gone to school in Philadelphia, dear," her mother would say sometimes, passing her hand over Glen's fine head caressingly, "and then abroad, if it had not been for the war, your father and I had planned it all." Or, "There is no hope of your coming out, or of our entertaining for you, as we would once have done. It would all have been so different if it had not been for the war."

Of course these were but minor considerations, and the girl unselfishly felt them to be such. Were there not always graver consequences to be lamented? Had not this insatiable war snatched from them their all, whitened her mother's hair with untimely snow, and torn son and brother from their arms? And just before her, as she reached the hall, was a sadder evidence than these of its terrors.

The hall was a fine old entrance to a fine old house. Its oaken floor and rich wainscot gleamed in the evening light, and a curiously carved settle ran around three of its sides.

A few high backed chairs and one or two old tables with quaint spindle legs constituted its meager furniture, but its noble proportions and rich carvings redeemed it from bareness, and it was sweet with the pine cones and wild flowers of which Glen had yesterday rifled the woods. A Glen filled with early violets and pale primroses was placed directly beneath a portrait draped with the sad Confederate flag, and looking up at the boyish face above her with all the fiery tragedy of a hopeless self devotion written upon it, Glen read once more through a mist of tears the inscription beneath:

"Captain Helen, a brave soldier and a gallant commander, fell in leading a charge at the battle of Antietam, Sept. 17, 1862."

As she turned away, her eyes instinctively seeking the window opposite which commanded a view of her foes, she started with surprise and terror. A man in the uniform of a Union cavalry officer was making his way up the long avenue to the house.

CHAPTER II.

"This is the ballroom," she said, suddenly stopping.

Before she had time to collect herself she heard the jingle of spurs outside, and a peremptory hand knocked at the door. It was barred and bolted. Before Glen had crossed the floor to open it she was herself again. As she stood with one hand still upon the bolt confronting her visitor the instinct of hospitality, as old as her race itself, forced a sentence from her unwilling lips. "Will you come in," she asked coldly but not ungraciously. An instinct as strong, the instinct of homage to her sex and her beauty, stirred in the man before her. With bared head and a profound bow, he accepted her invitation. His face was very young, Glen thought quickly—as young as the pictured face just opposite. Her eyes had noted the captain's epaulettes upon his shoulders, and his courteous manner reassured her.

"May I speak to the lady of the house?" he asked; "or, perhaps?"

Glen motioned him to a chair. "If you will be seated, I will call my mother," she said, and left the room. Now, if you had told Captain Campbell ten minutes before that this would be his method of approaching a southern household he would have laughed you to scorn. He had already planned this "move." He had meant simply to state to the owner or owners of the mansion that he required certain accommodations for his men in general and for a wounded comrade among them in particular. This was to be done in that curt, businesslike manner which befitted a Union officer upholding his government when addressing a rebel. And behold, a pair of beautiful eyes, which had looked up fearlessly into his own, had suddenly changed his tactics. The charms of the room into which he had entered completed the transformation he was undergoing.

There was little in it to attract a marauding soldier—there was much that appealed to the refinement of a man who in camp and bivouac had longed for all the sweet amenities of home, and been none the less brave for the longing. He revealed in the scent of the pine logs flickering softly on the hall hearth and mingling their perfume with that of the violets and primroses upon the quaint old tables. He even longed to touch a bit of feminine lacework which was reflected in the polished surface of one of them, upon which it lay. When he rose at the entrance of the lady of the house he bent before her with even greater reverence than that with which her daughter had inspired him. Surely she resembled his own mother, perhaps not in feature, but in that exquisite likeness of expression which all tender mothers bear to each other.

"Madam," he said, "I have no apology to offer for my intrusion but the fortunes of war. Your woods afford but a sorry asylum at this wet season, and a wounded fellow officer under my charge is afraid of suffering from the effects of exposure. I must ask shelter for him and for my men."

He was not wholly unprepared for the gentle courtesy of her reply.

"There are a number of vacant rooms in the house," she said. "They are at your disposal. Perhaps you had better look at them to ascertain if they are sufficient for your force. If not, I may be able to make other arrangements as my family is small. I will send some one to show you over the house."

It was well that he could not hear the troubled discussion which followed between mother and daughter in the next room.

"I am most unwilling, Glen," "But, mother, I am not at all afraid, and there is no one else; your going is out of the question. Maum Betsey would never mount the stairs with her 'jints,' and Nelse would betray us on the first landing. Set your mind at rest. Missy shall go with me."

And so it came to pass that Captain Campbell presently found himself following a slender figure, which held a lighted candle high in one hand, up a winding stairway and along a wide hall, with Missy toiling patiently in the rear. It was a strangely silent procession. His guide flitting on, with such quick, light footsteps before him, said nothing but a few words of explanation as they entered one misty, closed up room after the other; but he was sufficiently occupied in noting the poise of her head, the turn of her rounded wrist, the scant, soft folds of the gown that clung to her young shape. It was of some faint gray stuff—a moth-eaten heirloom of her mother's, if he had but known it—and her only adornment was a cluster of carnations which Missy had fastened at her sister's throat a half hour ago. He thought he had never seen colors so artistically blended.

"This is the ballroom," she said, suddenly stopping before a double door and throwing it open for him to enter. It was with a pang that she did so. Of all the rooms in the house it was in this that she had dreamed the sweetest day dreams. It had been used as a school room of late years, and an old blackboard and some forlorn desks in one corner still bore witness to this profanation, but a raised platform at one end for an orchestra attested its true character, and the floor was as smooth as polished ivory. There was a tradition in the family that Washington had once danced a minuet upon its honored boards, and that here Lafayette had bent the knee in stately courtesy to some fair ancestress of the Helens, but in all Glen's young girlhood it had never echoed to the footsteps of any dancers save those with whom her fancy had peopled it.

"What a fine old room!" said Campbell admiringly. He impulsively put out one foot to try the polished surface, and at the same time Missy, with her short skirts daintily lifted in her chubby hands and her charming head held smilingly to one side, advanced toward him with pretty mincing steps. He looked up, hoping to see her sister's severe young mouth relax, but there was a sudden whizz, the candle was dashed from her hand, and they were in utter darkness. Glen uttered a faint cry, there was a scream from Missy, and for one brief moment the captain felt that these two young creatures shrank toward him for protection, but Glen soon recovered herself.

"It was only a bat," she said calmly, and sure enough, when the candle was found and relit, the ugly creature, scared from some dusty hiding place, was seen circling and swooping over their heads. But they had had enough of exploring. As they retraced their steps the captain insisted upon holding the candle and leading the way, and Missy clung clinging to his hand, in spite of her sister's whispered remonstrances. When they reached the head of the stairs the small witch put up her arms with a plea to be "carried" which could not be resisted, and before Glen could interpose the captain had shifted his candle to the left hand and swung her up to his shoulder with his strong right arm, to her great glee and delight. All the way down the long staircase Glen bit her lip at the sight of the small, dark head resting so contentedly against the blond one, and when Missy's evening ablutions were performed some hours afterward, her left cheek and her pink right palm were scrubbed so vigorously as to cause complaint. When she came to say her prayers at her sister's knee, Glen stumbled at the sublime plea for forgiveness—"as we forgive those who trespass against us"—and hurried on, with a lump in her throat, to an additional petition.

WITH THE exception of the head of the state ticket and the Auditor, the nominations include the present incumbents, all efficient and trustworthy officials for whom the Republican constituency can cast a vote without any misgivings.

John W. Kimball of Fitchburg, nominee for Auditor, is a new man in that place and we trust will receive a flattering majority that will install him next January in the office now held by a representative of the Democratic party.

It is reported that Balmaceda has escaped from Chili, where he has been hiding since the overthrow of his government, on board the United States steamship San Francisco, going on board in the garb of an American sailor and playing the part of an inebriate. It appears that the Admiral was cognizant of the whole situation and permitted the farce to relieve the deposed President of the danger which beset him, out of pity for his condition and will land the fugitive in Calao or San Francisco whence he will eventually find his way to France or some other European country.

WE PRESENT upon our inside pages today a portrait and biographical sketch of the late George B. Loring, Salem's adopted and much honored son—honored for gifts of a rare order. He was an able, eloquent and highly entertaining speaker, ever ready on all occasions. He was one of the finest orators upon the American platform and possessed a rich, powerful voice which he readily adapted to any situation into which he chanced to be thrown.

The Doctor was a lifelong member of the Agricultural Society and was a great favorite and champion among the grangers, who will ever cherish pleasant recollections of the friendly intercourse so long enjoyed. He took great pride in his farm on Swampscott road, which he used as a private experimental station, with profit to the fraternity, if not to himself. His sudden death last Monday morning removed him from a field of usefulness which his outward appearance indicated he would fill.

His obsequies were held in North church Salem, where it had been his custom to attend to spiritual devotions when at home, and was attended by the Masonic order of which he was an honored member.

WE TAKE pleasure in announcing through our news columns, the nomination of Hon. Charles Herbert Allen as the choice of the Republican state convention, and we predict for him an election in November by a handsome majority. He has a clear record that must commend him to every true-hearted Republican throughout the Commonwealth. He is a man to arouse the enthusiasm of the voters, and we expect to see a revival this fall of the old time interest in state affairs among the Republican party.

Mr. Allen comes into the arena this fall amidst the plaudits of the entire rank and file of the party. Perfect harmony and cordiality between him and the numerous friends of his rival in the convention exists. There is nothing so far as is known to cause a single disaffection in the party. Nothing that will prevent a single Republican who takes the trouble to do his duty by going to the polls, from voting for the Republican head of the ticket.

On the contrary we believe the name of Allen will become a watchword and rallying signal in the present campaign and the apathy that too often prevents Republicans from doing their duty on election day will be dispelled by the magic of his well-earned reputation.

BAY STATE REPUBLICANS

Begin Their Deliberations at Tremont Temple.

THE RESULT IS UNCERTAIN.

Henry Cabot Lodge Makes the Opening Address, Reviewing What Has Been Done by Republicans and What They Intend to Do in the Future—Strong Denunciation of the Opposite Party.

Boston, Sept. 18.—The Republican state convention opened at Tremont Temple this morning at 11 o'clock sharp. It was called to order by Chairman Burdett of the state committee. He was elected temporary chairman and Henry Cabot Lodge permanent chairman.

Delegates were seated on the floor and in the first balcony, and the upper gallery was opened to the holders of visitors' tickets.

It is impossible to tell at this hour (1 p. m.) who will get the nomination.

Chairman Lodge's Address.

Whenever in Massachusetts any man or any measure is denounced in certain quarters as partisan you may be sure that that man or that measure is Republican. Whenever any man or any measure is praised by the same voices as non-partisan, you may be equally sure that that man or that measure is Democratic. Indeed, it is more absurd than the cant which undertakes to make partisan a term of reproach. There are those who believe that honesty and indifference and the critical trimmers and the people who see the other side more strongly than they do, but they have some times an important place in the world, but they do not make the world move. History has been made and mankind led in its onward march by partisans. The credits of honesty have been preached, the great reforms have been carried, the revolutions and battles of the world have been fought by partisans.

Partisanship may be good or evil, enlightened or unenlightened, but its quality is fixed not by itself, but by the character of the cause in which it is engaged. You cannot overcome evil or promote good by abolishing partisanship. Good can win the victory over evil only by having strong partisans to fight its battles. We meet here today to choose the Republican party, partisans of its cause and all that cause represents. We do not assert that our party is infallible. We know that like most things of human origin, it is liable to error.

It is liable to error and we are aware that perfection is only to be found at this precise epoch among those precious few, who for the moment are playing the part of the venerable on the common wood of the Democratic party. Yet, after all, the best hope for the progress of the world, the best hope for the progress of the United States, so far as that progress is affected by wise government and sound administration.

When we speak of our party, we mean a great deal more than the mere political organization. Read the history of the United States since 1776 and you read the history of the traditions of the Republican party. There is no need to dwell upon them. The quality of its membership is the same to-day as when it rallied to the support of Abraham Lincoln. It comprises the great body of those whom Lincoln called our plain people, the hard-working, energetic, honest, and progressive. Finally there are the principles of action. Let us take the last expression of those principles at the last national election. We then declared that we were in favor of the protection of American industry and the extension of American commerce; that we believed in majority rule in congress; that we believed in a dollar was on a parity with every other; that we believed in maintaining the reform of the civil service and that our policy toward foreign nations should be firm and dignified instead of weak and hesitating. Let me point out.

How We Have Kept Those Pledges.

In the first place, we kept our word as to majority rule in the house of representatives. We have shown that a majority can legislate and in so doing we have put the country where it belongs. For this great work we have been bitterly assailed, but that is one of the revolutions which do not go backward. Most of the reforms that we made in the past have been adopted in silence by the next congress. Of all the work that the Republican party has done since the war, none has been more important than this. It cannot be effaced and will ever remain an honor to the party to have demonstrated to the man who so fearlessly led the great struggle, Thomas B. Reed of Maine.

Our promise kept to free the house from the trammels of obstruction, passed on to the work of legislation. The extent and value of what we did are not even understood, for the consideration of one or two great questions have absorbed the attention of the country. But many other measures hardly less important than those which we have passed, have been passed by the new system. The single measure of international copyright, which the changes in the rules enabled us to pass, is in itself an enduring monument to the fifty-first congress and to the enlightened policy which governed it. The enlightened policy which governed it; we failed, unfortunately, to do anything for it.

Majority Rule at the Ballot-Box.

The house was true to its pledges, and passed a bill, but that bill was lost by the methods upon which I need not dwell. It was something to have done even half the work, but the Republican party can never afford to turn its back for a moment on the cause of honest elections. The freedom and equality of the ballot-box is one of the foundations of the Republic. Out of this foundation we will build the future of the people; in power we will seek the passage of laws which shall guard the greatest and most precious rights of the people. We kept our pledges also in regard to the currency. By treasury notes based upon silver we added to the circulation, but we so framed the law that the dollar in paper remained in gold and the dollar in silver remained. As we have always maintained they should, and we have maintained them. For more than this positive legislation was the fact that in two successive sessions we defeated the attempt to inflate the currency by the unlimited issue of a depreciated dollar. As in congress, so today in the country, the Republican party stands as the bulwark against the movement for the free coinage of silver, without an international agreement. President Harrison stands.

Ready to Meet the Coming Attack.

And his manly declaration on this point deserves our hearty commendation and support. The Democratic party is unconsciously in favor of free coinage. All but two Democratic senators voted for free silver, and of those two, one is dead. In the house a small minority of Republicans voted for free silver, and an equally small minority of Democrats voted against it. As in the house, so in the country, the Republican party stands for honest money.

It is useless to say that the Democrats of New England are as sound on the money question as the Republicans. The Democrats of New England will be governed by their party while they stay in it. The amiable young men whom you say to the country that they will talk as they could control their party on this matter. They will all vote sooner or later for a free silver speaker, and they can give no more powerful aid to the free silver cause than by so doing for it is the speaker who makes committees, who leads the party and who shapes their immediate following straight on the question. It is not easy to prove that 80 cents do not make a dollar to a party whose numbers in Boston at least believe that in three months make a year. It is not forgotten that in Maine and Massachusetts the Democratic party once sustained the cause of free money. If you permit Massachusetts to be carried by the Democratic party at the coming election, you say to the country that Massachusetts today approves, on the whole, of Democratic principles and Democratic measures, including free silver.

Democratic victory in Massachusetts means aid and comfort to the Democratic party in the country. The Republican party is today the friend and supporter of what we believe to be a Grievous Peril to the Currency.

and to our business welfare. The Republican party cannot afford to win any victories by concessions to the friends of unsound and dishonest finance. Better defeat a thousand times than any yielding on this principle which touches directly the earnings and the lives of the masses of the American people. It is times of unsettled times the speculator and the capitalist can always make money, but those times bring disaster and distress to the body of the people. The free silver coinage under present conditions means the coming of such times with all their attendant misfortune. The Republican party stand as it has always stood, for honest money. Every man who believes in honest money and who is opposed to an inflated currency must vote with the Republican party.

The Tariff.

We kept our pledges about the tariff. We promised a reduction of the annual surplus, something very different from the accumulation of surplus which we have kept. We have reduced the surplus revenue by the removal of duties to the amount of nearly $3,000,000. We have taken these duties chiefly from sugar, and today that which enters into the consumption of every household is more than 2 cents a pound cheaper than it was before the tariff of 1890. We are obliged to import sugar, and we can not raise more than a fraction of what we can get for the sugar duties were not protected, and their removal as a tax was the greatest and most general benefit that could have been devised. Do the Democrats propose when they wipe out the protective duties to replace them by restoring the sugar tax? As to the tariff at large, we promised to revise it, to reduce and equalize duties, and to stop fraud in the revenue. These things we have done.

The measures we passed must be judged by results as a general policy and not by details. In articles not produced in the country, the tariff of 1890 has given the people the freest list they have ever had and more imports in value come into the country free today than ever before. The law sought to put a profit in protection to growing industries and to develop new ones. It is too soon even now to state the full results of the measure, but the results are beginning to appear. Large numbers of new industries are springing into existence. Even under the clause most bitterly attacked, great improvements are being made in the being made by improved methods and the Welsh monopoly, which fixed the price for the United States in the woolen trade, has been broken. The high-price panic so skillfully wrought at the last election is seen now to have been the creation of the false promise and will recoil upon those who devised it.

If defects exist in the McKinley bill, they can and will be remedied by the friends of the protective principle, but the purpose of the Democratic party is not to modify an existing law, but to protect the entire fabric of policy. As we stand for protection to the ballot-box and protection to the honest matter of principle, without regard to percentages or schemes, we stand for the protection of American labor, American industry, and American commerce.

With protection, we have united as part of the system, reciprocity, for we are enabled by protection to offer substantial values for reciprocal commercial adventures in other countries. In this way we have new markets to American trade and have alarmed our great rivals in the world. We have made two successful treaties with Brazil and Spain, and others still will follow the skillful guidance of Mr. Blaine.

We promised to extend commerce, and with protection and reciprocity we coupled the bill of 1890. Five ships of 5000 tons each are already building under this act for the South American trade. They mean American labor in their construction and American earnings in their earnings. They also are required by law to be built as auxiliaries for our navy. In case of war we could develop a fleet of 100 ships and others built on the same conditions become part of the American navy when the first hostile gun is fired. In this legislation we are doing a great deal for the commerce, and we are adding a new class of fast ships to our means of defense.

The "Billion-Dollar Congress."

One word as to a charge that has been made against us. Every Democratic newspaper and every Democratic orator has been declaiming against the billion-dollar congress. Let us imagine that when the Democrats had control of congress they paid all the expenses of government out of their pockets. But in reality it is only a question of increase. The issue is one which I welcome. I believe not only that the increased expenditures were justified, but that the Democratic party should be held responsible for its failure in many cases to make these increases before. In 1890 the Democrats had control of the house, where they appropriated $18,000,000, while the Republican congress, the fifty-first, appropriated $98,000,000, a net increase of $80,000,000. Fifty-first over the fiftyth of $170,000,000. Let us account for it, for it is wrong in the aggregate it is wrong in detail.

The principal item of increase was $13,000,000 for pensions. Roughly speaking, two-thirds of this was to supply deficiencies caused by the inadequate appropriations of the preceding congress and by the growing number of pensioners under existing law. The rest was to meet the demand called for by the new pension bill of 1890. The Democrats have undertaken to assail the pension legislation of the Republican party. If they are opposed to it, let them come out into the open and say so officially. Governor Russell at Sandwich praised ex-President Cleveland for his pension votes. Let them repeat that praise of September 22 in their resolutions. Let them go to Worcester and denounce the pension appropriations of the last congress. Let them do it. Let them either specifically denounce us for our pension appropriations or let them denounce the pension appropriations of the last congress. If they are silent, they assent; if they speak out, we will fight them on this theme as on all others.

Take out the pension increase and there is left some $67,000,000 to be considered. The next item of increase was in the postal service, which amounted to $22,000,000. This, in the first place, is an apparent and not a real increase in expense, increases in salaries, the annual deficit made good by the government has not increased largely. But let us stand as it is. We are ready to debate it with the Democrats, and I challenge them to declare against it in their resolutions.

Thirty-five in the senate in 1890, and of that sum nearly $12,000,000 went for the support of our navy. Are the Democrats opposed to that expenditure? Again I dare them to declare that the increased appropriation for the navy, instead of being too large, was not large enough. The next increase was some $3,000,000 for the West Coast. It is a dispute that? It stands upon the same ground as the policy of increasing the navy.

The expenses of the eleventh census took $6,000,000. Democratic votes added $1,000,000 to it by demanding a census of existing mortgages; $3,500,000 was appropriated for carrying out certain treaties by which we bought lands for the occupation of the people of the United States; $1,500,000 went for the National Guard, $1,500,000 for the aid to the state homes; $1,500,000 for the river and harbor bill. We are ready to discuss with the Democratic party the policy of internal improvements and appropriations for them; there was $1,300,000 of increase appropriated for the French spoliation claims. Both the Republican and Democratic parties voted in favor of those claims, and the Democratic party of Massachusetts declare, if it dares, that it is opposed to the payment of these honest debts.

How is it in regard to the item where it is the popular opinion that money is wasted by congress in the purchase of buildings? Under this head the aggregate appropriations of the fiftyth congress for new buildings exceed those of the fifty-first by $485,000. I hope the Democrats will not be so foolish as to say that the Democrats of the fifty-first have accounted for more than $170,000,000, for we make some decreases and therefore the increase is less than the gross which I have been stating.

The fifty-first congress met the deficiency of the Treasury; it left the government to the next congress, as far as provision can be made without deficiencies; it made new appropriations which the people have been long demanding. But this is a matter which has chiefly with the administration. Under the last administration the commission was an inefficient one and the law weakened in its hands. It devolved upon President Harrison to reorganize the commission. In the Republican vacancy he put more Roosevelt, who has enforced the law, defended it and fought its battles as has never been done before. With him, in the Democratic vacancy, the president associated Governor Thompson of South Carolina, a most admirable selection. President Harrison put in force the extension of the reform system by the railway mail service, covering over 600 clerks. Still more recently he has put some 700 employees of the civil service under the civil service commission, rendering thereby the greatest possible service to a department where incalculable injury has been done by political appointments. He has also made the rules so as to bring promotions under the law.

Another matter that lies within the province of the administration is that of Foreign Policy.

I will not detain you with a contrast between our foreign policy as administered by Mr. Bayard and as administered by Mr. Blaine. Mr. Blaine, when he took the department, found our relations with Germany embroiled and unpleasant, complicated by the treaty of Commerce, the Samoan treaty, which came within six months after our return to power, and the law of American diplomacy which no one can dispute. Three months ago, after long negotiations, the Behring sea troubles were left to arbitration, a close season was obtained and the whaling fleet of the seals has been stopped. We had recently a difficulty with Italy. Is there any man here who would deny that in that difficulty Mr. Blaine manifested the firmness and dignity which the people demanded and which the United States in the position which they occupy are entitled to maintain?

Time fails me to go into details of every department, but the general conduct of the public business and the administration of the challenge comparison in any field with the preceding administration. On the issues of the future is the restriction of immigration, and it is to the Republican party that the people must look for decisive action. This is a great and growing evil. We have had a law which was the time has come to exclude the vicious and the ignorant. To that work the Republican party is ready to address itself.

State Issues.

This election is a concerned with national questions alone. The immediate object before us is the control of the state of Massachusetts, and the situation is one which demands careful consideration. Let us see to it that we do not make a mistake. Two Democratic state officers were elected in 1890, Mr. Russell for governor, and Mr. Russell for lieutenant governor. If I am not mistaken, Mr. Russell is the first Democratic officer Massachusetts has had for forty-five years. This new auditor is an honest and capable man, and if he is doing his duty, he would have told us of them. He is not there. What a tribute this is to the administration of a former governor of the Democratic rule in Rhode Island. The Democratic rule in Rhode Island, the Democratic rule in Massachusetts in the books and accounts to rectify. In the past six years, there have been no deficiencies in the accounts of the state treasury. The Democratic party was the governor. Governor Russell is a gentleman of education and character, a respected citizen and an agreeable speaker, possessing the same remarkable faculty as a great exemplar, ex-President Cleveland, of saving "an undisputed thing in such a solemn way."

Mr. Lodge made quite a lengthy criticism of some of Governor Russell's appointments, and continued:

They [Democrats] try to say that we have state issues, and that a vote for governor is a vote for a state issue. This is false. The two questions of the gravest importance with which the state government is concerned. The first is

The Temperance Question.

The Republican party has placed upon the statute books laws for the promotion of temperance and the restriction of the liquor traffic. These laws have been adopted by the system which has been adopted of local option and high limited license. Great advances have been made, and we stand ready to improve them and to strengthen and to make them in every practical way. Democratic supremacy means the downfall of all intelligent legislation.

The second issue concerns the work of public education. The Republican party is pledged to maintain and defend the public school system. It is in deep earnest upon this point, and offers no lip service but means just what it says. It will maintain and defend the public school system, and legislation can be devised to raise their standards or to improve or strengthen them, that legislation the Republican party will pass. Is the Democratic party really the friend of the public schools of Wisconsin and Illinois? When the Democratic party took power in 1890, they were in a battle upon the public schools system. It did not hesitate to join in the assault. When a bill for compulsory education was passed by a Republican legislature in the last congress, the veto of a Democratic governor. Here in this very city of Boston the present mayor has let a hole torn in the compulsory education. He knew his party.

The Republican party has a noble record. In the last two years it has done great public work. It is ready to stand upon it. The time has come to ask questions of our opponents. That is there in their past that justifies giving them political power, here in the present, what do they propose? Remonetization, opposition to sumptuary laws and the revision of the laws of the state, the Mugwump element just now at the front. What do these things mean in plain English? Let us translate them. Remonetization, free silver; opposition to sumptuary laws, free liquor selling; revision of the free trade. To all those things we are opposed.

A Preliminary Skirmish.

The battle this year is but a preliminary to the great struggle of next year, and must be interpreted. A vote for Governor Russell is a vote for free silver, for Democratic victory in Massachusetts means the adoption of the policy that Massachusetts prefers the Democratic party with it. A vote for Governor Russell means free trade, not amendments to the tariff of 1890, not free raw materials for the benefit of New England, but naked free trade. A vote for Governor Russell means a vote to establish the Democratic party in this state. Let that party once get its talons fixed upon the body politic of Massachusetts, and the methods of government which have made the state honored and respected for the lifetime of a generation, will be replaced by the methods of the Boston Democrats, let us have a double standard in our currency, but they have a double standard for political parties and political morals. This double standard, however, is in reality a compliment to the Republican party, for it means that more is expected of us than of our opponents. We do not expect the test. More is expected of us than of the opposition, and we will prove our right to the distinction by our superiority in men and measures.

The struggle in Massachusetts begins today. I do not in the least under-rate the difficulties of the task before us. We have a powerful and unscrupulous enemy who will strain every nerve to increase the boot which they have put on our backs. We must stand for protection to our lot-box, to our industries and our labor, to our citizenship, our homes and our schools. The Republican party is ready to make that stand, and by lowering its standard of leadership or abandoning its principles. We will raise high the old and the new, and the other, in one word let us be true to ourselves, and then, with undoubting faith in the right, we can leave the rest to the people of Massachusetts.

Wm. Webber & Co.
AN ARTISTIC DISPLAY OF
FINE IMPORTED NOVELTIES

IN LADIES'

Dress Textures.

One week ago we made an Exhibit of Early Autumn Dress Goods. The response to our invitation to inspect the stock at so early a date was most gratifying. From every side we were commended, not only for the extraordinary collection of beautiful new stuffs, but for making so complete a showing so early in the season.

Today we make the second great display by placing on sale our entire importations of Fine Imported Novelties, which have been most carefully selected at the world's great center.

These novelties, added to the multitude of stuffs already on the counters, make the stock larger than any we have ever exhibited in the past, and it is believed, THE GREATEST ARRAY OF DRESS TEXTURES ever shown in Salem.

The Bedford Corsets are popular—the highest grades most popular. They go from 75 cents to $2.50. Adding together the various colors in the several grades, you get a choice, through every shade from white to black. On Bedford Corsets we have followers but not leaders.

Imported Dress Patterns and Robes.

High novelties in fine Robes form a very important part of today's Exhibition. Most of the designs shown represent but one or two dresses of a coloring, and cannot possibly be duplicated the present season.

They come from the hands of one of the most celebrated artists in the French capital. All are strikingly original. These dresses alone are well worth a visit to see. We have never shown their equal.

Prices $10.00, $12.00, $14.00, $16.00, $20.00, $22.00.

If you have made up your mind to buy Hood's Sarsaparilla do not be induced to take any other. A Boston lady, whose example is worthy imitation, tells her experience below: "In one store where I went to buy Hood's Sarsaparilla the clerk tried to induce me to buy their own instead of Hood's; he told me their's would last longer; that I might take it on ten days' trial; that if I did not like it I need not pay anything, etc. But he could not prevail on me to change. I told him I had taken Hood's Sarsaparilla, knew what it was, was satisfied with it, and did not want any other. When I began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla I was feeling real miserable with dyspepsia, and so weak that at times I could hardly

LOCAL LINES.

A band concert will be given at the Willows tomorrow afternoon from 3 to 5 o'clock.

The Casino Club will award the watch offered by the club to the most popular lady, to Miss Julia Williams clerk at D. J. Sweeney fruit and periodical store.

We extend thanks to Joseph Breck & Son, 53 North Market street, Boston, for a copy of their annual catalogue of Holland bulbs and other flowering plants for fall planting. It is neat and attractive, being well illustrated, and contains a list of names. It will be mailed free upon application to any of the readers of the PRESS.

The legal blanks published by the Salem Press are commanding the attention of the legal fraternity hereabouts. They are prepared by an attorney of well known ability and are as reliable as those published by Warren or the other recognized law stationers and being conveniently located it is easy for everyone to get just what he wants, at short notice.

The Seventy-first annual Fair of the Essex Agricultural Society opens at Lawrence on Tuesday. Full information was published some weeks since, in the PRESS. Any of our readers who desire special information regarding exhibits should consult John M. Danforth, Lynnfield Centre who will put them in communication with the proper committees. The fair promises to be a great success.

At the Democratic caucus last evening the following delegates were elected: state convention W. H. Brown, Levi Preston, A. B. Clark, P. H. O'Co nor. Jas. E. Milles, J. Failen, C. W. Osborn, Thos. Carroll, A. F. Clark; county, Thos. Clotney, Malachi J. Doulon, Jas. E. Newhall, N. A. Bushby, N. P. Hill, Martin Tobin, Thos. C. Durkee, Thos. J. Relihan, Daniel F. McCarthy Senatorial; S. S. Littlefield, D. J. Sweeney, L. Preston, E. H. Shannon, W. J. McCarthy, J. H. Tibbets, U. A. Brophy D. J. Courcy, C. J. Houghton. The majority of the latter delegates are said to favor Mr. Sears.

Tuesday evening as Charles F. Farrington who resides on Warren street, was driving a colt belonging to R. F. Dodge, the wheels scraped upon the rails of the street cars on Lowell street, which frightened the animal and he ran, getting beyond control of his driver, and finding it impossible to hold the horse Mr. Farrington attempted to turn up Perkins street, and in doing so the wagon was overturned throwing out the occupants. Mr. Farrington landed on his head on the curbstone and was rendered unconscious. He was conveyed to his home and was unconscious all night, Friday he rallied a little and this morning he is still more comfortable, and regained consciousness. It is hoped by the physician he has received no permanent injuries. The other occupant Bryon L. Bullens escaped with a little shaking up.

It is not the selling price alone, that must be considered, in arriving at a knowledge of the value of an article. There is as much real pure soap in a bar of Dobbins' Electric as in four bars of any other soap made, and it will, if used according to directions, do four times as much work as any other. Its cost is but a very slight advance on that of inferior soap. Insist upon Dobbins' Electric I. L. CRAIG & CO., Philadelphia, Pa.

policy of reciprocity. Section 6 condemns the charge of extravagance in pensions, but that they simply fulfilled pledges made to the loyal soldiers of the country, while section 7 deals with our immigration laws and the absolute necessity for a careful watch to be kept on those who seek a home in our country, so that the honest citizen shall not become contaminated with the refuse of Europe and Asia.

8. Conceding all latitude of individual opinion and choice in the training of youth, we regard our present system of public education as the strength and glory of Massachusetts, as the institution of all others which ensures the safety of all our institutions, and promotes, by the association and common experience of the children of Massachusetts, the formation of patriotic character and the unification of our people in patriotic sentiment and purpose.

9. The Republican party of Massachusetts has repeatedly declared itself in favor of pronounced and progressive temperance legislation, and its policy as outlined in the past should in the future be vigorously maintained and preserved; we therefore favor the most efficient legislation for the restriction, prevention and suppression of the evils arising from the sale of intoxicating liquors, and we demand that the law for the promotion of this desirable result be faithfully, diligently and vigorously enforced.

10. The standard of living and education among the working people is the test of the prosperity of a country; their welfare is the welfare of the state, and all just and reasonable legislation calculated to maintain and advance the present high standard of Massachusetts in this regard, and to insure to all the full enjoyment of the fruits of their labor, should receive our earnest approbation and support.

11. The executive council is firmly, yet cautiously, performing its duties as contemplated by the constitution and as formulated by the statutes, and in serving as a salutary check upon partisan and arbitrary action has efficiently fulfilled its high constitutional function, and deserves the commendation of the people of Massachusetts.

12. In support of the principles outlined in the foregoing resolutions, we invite the cooperation of all patriotic men without regard to previous party affiliations, and especially of all workingmen, to whom, more than to any other class, "free silver" and "free trade" would alike prove disastrous. We are convinced that the evil tendencies and results of Democratic administration in the commonwealth and of its influence in the country at large have become so manifest as to alarm the people, and to prove that in all efforts to promote good government, security and progress, their chief reliance is, as formerly, the Republican party and the highest interests of the country of government and business, in foreign and domestic affairs, in state or nation, demand the success of the Republican party and the triumph of its principles, and that success we are resolved to achieve.

Several motions were made with regard to the time allowed speakers, and finally it was agreed that twenty minutes should be allowed. Immediately after its adoption ex-Governor Long strode to the front of the platform, and as soon as the applause which greeted him subsided, began his speech of presentation of Hon. W. W. Crapo as the candidate.

Upon the close of Governor Long's speech, which was received with great applause, William Cogswell rose and was recognized by the chairman to present the name of Charles H. Allen of Lowell.

Mr. Cogswell's rising was greeted with a tremendous burst of applause, which was thought by many to presage Allen's nomination by the convention.

The Handsome of all Coins.

This proud distinction is generally conceded to the United States twenty-dollar gold piece, a marvel of beauty in design and finish. The loveliest of God's handiwork is a handsome woman, if in bloom of health; if she is not well, her face is pale, and her features are sunken. Ladies who use this peerless remedy are unanimous in its praise, for it cures those countless ills which are the bane of their sex: irregularities, dragging-down pains, for inflammation, hysteria, sleeplessness, and the "all gone" sensations which burden their daily lives. A tonic and nerve, without alcohol.

At the annual meeting of the Jordan Lodge F. & A. M. on Wednesday evening, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year, all being the present incumbents W. M., Elmer M. Poor; S. W., Emory W. Myers; J. W., Samuel C. Lord; Treasner, Wyman B. Richardson; Secretary, James Rodie; The second degree was worked and reports of the several standing Committees were read and accepted.

The selectmen had a long conference with President Amos F. Breed of the Lynn & Boston street railway last week, which resulted in an amelioration of some of the conditions tacked on to the electric franchise granted the road. The conditions now stand about the same as those imposed upon the Naumkeag road, and expire Jan. 1, 1893. The Lynn company will re-lay its rails, using a heavy T rail, and cobblestone paving will be used between the rails. Poles will be set this fall, but the overhead wiring will not be strung before spring opens.

The Salem Evening News publishes a story of a swindle practised upon a local jeweller, which, if true, shows the danger to which patrons of jewelry establishments are exposed, even in comparatively small towns like Peabody. The story, which is denied by the interested parties is substantially as follows: A lady took her husband's watch to the jeweller referred to, for repairs, at the same time taking one away that had already been fixed, giving her husband's name and saying she would pay for the repairs upon both watches when she called for her husband's. A stranger was in the store at the time, and it is presumed he overheard the conversation, as some days later a man saying the lady who brought it sent him, and giving the name, paid for the repairs and took the watch. Later the jeweller found he had been swindled, as the party who took the watch away was unknown to him or the owner of the timekeeper.

Sudden Death of Dr. George B.

Loring.

A BRIEF SKETCH OF HIS LIFE.

One of Massachusetts' Brightest Professional, Literary, Public and Political Lights—United States Commissioner of Agriculture.

SALEM, Mass., Sept. 15.—Hon. George B. Loring died at his home on Loring avenue, at an early hour Monday morning. The doctor was taken ill with dysentery a week ago last Saturday morning, and for a few hours suffered great pain. He then became much easier, and during the past week was steadily improving. Sunday, however, he was not so well, but in the evening appeared quite comfortable again.

GEORGE B. LORING.

Soon after midnight he had a relapse, suffering much pain and growing rapidly weaker. A messenger was hastily dispatched for Dr. Mack, the family physician, but as it took some time to drive in town and call the doctor and for him to drive out to the house, Dr. Loring was dead when he arrived. The immediate cause of death was heart failure, the result of exhaustion from the bowel trouble.

Interested in the State Campaign.

Dr. Loring was out on the street and in Boston ten or twelve days ago, and up to the time of his sudden prostration, had been in the enjoyment of his usual good health. He had taken a great deal of interest in the state campaign, urging in frequent newspaper interviews the nomination of ex-Governor Brackett. He would have undoubtedly taken the stump for whoever was nominated had he lived, for a political campaign was almost a recreation to him. Dr. Loring was Salem's most prominent and best known resident, and might well be termed her "first citizen." He will be greatly missed on her streets and in her political, social and agricultural gathering. The funeral will be held on Thursday at an hour to be fixed later.

Brief Sketch of His Life.

Hon. George B. Loring was born at North Andover, Mass., Nov. 8, 1817. He was the son of Rev. Bailey and Sally P. (Osgood) Loring. His education began in the village school, from whence, at the age of 10 years, he was sent to Franklin academy. He entered Harvard college in 1834, and upon his graduation studied medicine with Dr. Joseph Kittredge at North Andover. Then he became a member of the Harvard medical school, and obtained the degree of M. D. in 1842. After practicing his profession in North Andover for about a year, he was appointed to the post of surgeon in the United States marine hospital at Chelsea, where he remained about seven years, having been in 1849 appointed commissioner to revise the hospital system. He removed to Salem in 1851, and was afterward appointed postmaster of that city, holding that office for four years, until 1857.

Was Minister to Portugal.

For many years he applied himself to practical and scientific agriculture, and to the preparation and delivery of addresses upon those and kindred subjects. He was a member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives from 1866 to 1868. He became president of the New England Agricultural Society at its formation in 1864, and held the position at the time of his death. He was a delegate to the national Republican conventions in 1868, 1873 and 1876; chairman of the state Republican committee from 1869 to 1876, and president of the state senate from 1874 to 1877. He was elected to congress as a Republican in 1876, and served until 1881, when he became United States commissioner of agriculture, remaining in that office until 1885. In 1889 he was appointed by President Harrison as minister to Portugal, which position he held for little more than a year. He returned from this mission on a leave of absence, and concluded to resign, it being alleged by his friends that he found the office an expensive one.

An Error of Judgment.

During his term as commissioner of agriculture he devoted $20,000, about two-thirds of the appropriation, for the distribution of prizes and for experiments in the culture of sorghum, beets and other plants for the production of sugar. The controller of the treasury disallowed the accounts upon the ground that the appropriation did not include or authorize such expenditure, the commissioner claiming that the experiments, prizes, seeds and labor were all useful, and that each and all of them were contemplated by congress when it made the appropriation. There was never any question of wrong doing on the part of the commissioner in the matter, his political opponents claiming only that he erred in judgment. Up to the year 1861 Dr. Loring, who had been nurtured in the Democratic faith, retained his early political opinions, but since that time he has been a stalwart Republican.

His Literary Contributions.

He published an "Essay on Phlebotomy" (1840); "Review of the Scarlet Letter" (1851); "Modern Agriculture" (1861); "The Relation of Agriculture to the State in Time of War" (1862); "Scientific and Practical Agriculture" (1864); "The Assassination of Lincoln" (1865); "The New Era of the Republic" (1866); "The Power of an Educated Commonwealth" (1867); "The Farm Yard Club of Gotham" (1876); "The Cattle Industry" (1884); "The Influence of the Puritan on American Civilization" (1887), and other articles. Dr. Loring was twice married, first to a Miss Pickman of Salem, who died about 1877, and later to a Mrs. Stevens of New York. His second wife survives him, and he leaves a daughter by his first wife, Miss Sally Loring, and a stepson, the child of his second wife.

Member of the Naumkeag Fire Club.

Dr. Loring was an old and honored member of the Naumkeag Fire club, a member of the Essex institute, President of the Salem lyceum, member of "the board," and of the Massachusetts Consistory, Scottish Rite Masonry.

"Upper" And "Lower" Middle Classes.

It is not very easy to define the middle class. It has, indeed, grown so large that the English themselves divide it into the "upper" and "lower" middle classes, and these two divisions are fast becoming as distinct as the warrior and merchant castes of India. In the "upper" ranks are all the professional men; and to-day, that trade has become quite the correct thing, all the larger merchants and bankers, and even shopkeepers, artists, literary men, and actors too—since actors have taken to playing the part of leading citizen—are included. In the "lower" division are the smaller tradesmen and shop-keepers, the great army of petty clerks, teachers in the Board Schools, and, in a word, those whose work, though of less intrinsic value, is considered a shade more respectable than that of the genuine workman or artisan. We are all for respectability in our degenerate age.

This "upper" middle class, taken as a whole, is the chief power in the land because of its wealth, the main prop and stay of aristocratic institutions because of its respect for the class above it, and the principal stimulus to socialism because of its contempt for the class below. The very stronghold of British conservatism, it would as soon think of supporting Mr. Gladstone as of making a French salad. It is within its ranks that the British matron reigns supreme and the young person prevails. Convention is its creed, and the Prince of Wales its prophet. It knows no authority but the Times and the Telegraph, the Royal Academy supplies its art, and Mr. Jerome K. Jerome is its literary idol. Of course there are notable exceptions to this rule. In the professional, artistic, and literary groups intellectual pursuits have necessarily broadened men's social and political standards. You see the difference in the greater independence of the women, many of whom go into journalism or medicine, or even trade, less because they have to than because they seek occupation. You see it in the wider interest of the men, whose studies have forced them to acknowledge that, after all, the universe is not bounded by the British Channel and the Atlantic Ocean. It must be admitted, however, that now authors and artists have bartered their freedom for a mess of social pottage; they are often the most bound down of all the great middle-class, slaves to respectability of the English middle-class interior.

The line which separates "upper" and "lower" middle classes is really far more sharply defined than that which lies between the former and the aristocracy. If instead of saying we are all socialists nowadays, Mr. John Morley had discovered that we are all in trade, he would have been nearer the truth. There are coal merchants and cab proprietors in the House of Lords. And, on the other hand, it is no rare thing, but a common occurrence, for members of the professional, literary, and artistic sets to be presented at court, and included in the invitation to state functions. And with their manner of life, it is not easy to point to a great and distinctive difference, though, in this respect, between "upper" and "lower" middle the gulf is wide. A few years ago there was a fire in the Guards' Club in Pall Mall, and members, while repairs were being made, were taken in at the Oxford and Cambridge. "Aoh! really," one was heard to say at dinner, "these middle-class fellows don't drink bad wine, do they?" The story is characteristic.

"Middle class fellows" don't live badly according to aristocratic ideals. You will find that actual living, that is, when understood to mean eating and drinking, is much the same in middle-class households as in ducal mansions. In both is that endless succession of meals that frightens the American when he first comes to England—the early cup of tea in the bedroom, the late breakfast, the two o'clock luncheon the five o'clock tea, the seven or eight o'clock dinner, the ten o'clock cup of tea—a succession that threatens to leave time for little else.

The great difference really consists in the fact that work is the rule with the "upper" middle class, leisure with the aristocracy. In this respect there is a much closer correspondence between the former and our well-to-do professional and merchant class. In the first place, since most professional and business men must be in town almost all the year round, in England, as America, they live in town, and do not merely come up for the London season. (What I say of London holds good in the provinces, but it is easier to speak of life in one particular place.) They go away for the long vacation in the autumn and at Christmas and Easter and Whitsuntide. To take a holiday then is as necessary to every middle-class Englishman who can afford it as it is to eat bacon for breakfast, or drink wine with his dinner. It is at these seasons that Norway and Switzerland and Italy are overrun with English tourists. But often and far as they travel, determined as they are to spend every available moment in the country, their home is in town or in the near suburbs.

SUDDEN DEATHS.

Heart disease is by far the most frequent cause of sudden death, which in three out of four cases is unsuspected. The symptoms are not generally understood. These are: a habit of lying on the right side, short breath, pain or distress in side, back or shoulder, irregular pulse, asthma, weak and hungry spells, wind in stomach, swelling of ankle or dropsy, oppression, dry cough and smothering. Dr. Miles' illustrated book on Heart Disease, free at William T. Lee's who sells and guarantees Dr. Miles' unequalled New Heart Cure, and his Restorative Nervine, which cures nervousness, headache, sleeplessness, effects of drinking, etc. It contains no opiate.

The Mystic Races.

Mystic Park on Tuesday, Sept. 29, and for the three following days, will be the scene of what promises to be the greatest meeting that the New England Association of Trotting Horse Breeders has ever held. Many special features will be introduced in addition to the numerous stakes which are to be trotted for, and the programme will be as it is extensive. Extra purses have been added to a number of the stakes, and the events will all be most interesting, as the number of best horses entered for the various races is greater than at any meeting ever held in this section of the country. A new feature which will attract the attention of anyone desirous of securing a valuable horse at a fair price, is the auction sale of fine stock which will be held every morning. Among the breeders and owners of thoroughbreds who have entered horses for sale are James O. Gray of Paris Study Park, John R. Graham of Boston, B. D. Whitcomb of Boston and others. This is the first time that such an opportunity has been presented to Eastern men to secure fine stock without a trip to Kentucky or other distant points. The programme of stake races is appended; the special features, which are being arranged, will be announced later.

On Tuesday, the first day, the stake for foals of 1890 bred in New England will be run for.

On the same day, a stake for foals of 1889, owned by the nominators Jan. 1st, with $100 added to the $50 entrance fees, is also on the programme.

A purse of $1000 has been given in the 2:30 class. Horses have been entered by Col. John E. Thayer, of Lancaster, J. E. Madden, Lexington, Ky.; Pork Stock Farm, Providence, R. I.; William Mason, Boston; E. E. Frost, Worcester; George W. Leavitt, Boston; Samuel Hodgson, Meredith, N. H.; James Golden, Medford; C. L. Cushman, Auburn, Me.; William Russell Allen (Allen Farm), Pittsfield; E. D. Wiggins, Bellingham; J. H. May, Readville; M. P. T. Soley, Showhegan, Me.; George H. Hicks, Allston, and M. B. Wilcox, Southington, Ct.

On the following day there three events on the programme. The first is a stake for foals of 1889, bred in New England.

The 2:40 class for the "Tyro" stakes will also be called on this day. William Mason has added $500 to the entrance fees.

The card for this day ends with the 2:20 class for pacers. The Association has added $100 to the stake as has also James O. Grey.

The third day of the meeting opens with the great 2:20 class for trotting stallions. Pres. John E. Thayer has added $1000 to the stake. The field will be a wonderful one and include Viking, Leicester, Early Bird, Sprague Goldust, The Seer, Charley Wilkes, Myrtlewood. This is the greatest field of stallions ever gotten together.

The third and final event on this day will be for foals of '87 or later.

On the fourth and last day, with the features to be announced later, and two events. The Futurity stakes, for produce of mares foaling in '88, to be bred, to be bred in New England, will be the first event.

The other event already arranged for on this day, is for horses in the 2.25 class, for a $1000 purse.

What Becomes of the Newsboys?

What becomes of the newsboys who swarm in the city? The man who knew the most about that subject was the late Charles L. Brice, of the Children's Aid society. Some of them, as they grow up, get places in stores and other business houses; some find employment as apprentices at trades; some strike out for themselves by leaving town to try their luck elsewhere; many die from hardship and exposure before reaching the age of 15; not a few take advantage of the privilege offered by the Children's Aid society and thus get along in life; some of them do quite well in the world. A large proportion are very smart boys.—New York Sun.

Cloak room, second floor front.

All summer we have been planning, thinking out and working out the blanket problem, and we now are ready with our solution—a finer, larger and cheaper stock of blankets than ever.

Briefest of words about 'em—

At $1. 10-4 white blankets, better than you can imagine for this little money.

At $1.50. 10-4 white blankets, partly wool and wholly good and serviceable.

At $1.75. 10-4, warmer and heavier.

At $2.50. 11-4, a goodly showing of wool, large and warm.

At $3.50. 11-4, quite above what is generally sold for this money.

At $5. As blanket stocks are usually judged by their five-dollar blankets, we are proud to let this stand for ours. 11-4, soft, fine wool, with only enough of hidden cotton to insure strength and wear.

At $6. 11-4, fancy Jacquard borders in different colors.

At $6.50. 12-4, all wool, big and warm, soft and heavy.

At $7.50. 11-4, finest of wool, wide fancy borders of fern, cat-o'-nine-tails and other patterns.

At $9.50. Richest of pure wool, fluffy, luxurious.

At $12, $13. Very large and heavy, of the $15, $16, finest wool that comes from sheep, rich borders.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE.

Commencing next Monday, September 21st and balance of the week with usual Matinees will witness the first presentation at the Grand Opera House, Boston, of the great New York Success "Kidnapped." The play is a powerful scenic melodrama from the pen of Mr. D. K. Higgins, author of Byron's Plunger, and abounds in startling and strong climaxes and uproariously funny situations.

"Kidnapped" belongs to the class of plays which are written to instruct and amuse and builded to please the masses. The play deals with many phases of city life, its characters being drawn from the slums, the home and the street. It presents plastic pictures which all the world sees and understands. Moved by motives felt and experienced in everyday life, its situations and climaxes are appreciated with an intelligence born of contract with just characters and situations.

The play is elaborately mounted, some of the effects, notably the abduction, in which a young and beautiful lady is thrown into a hack (drawn by a pair of prancing horses,) and driven off the stage at full speed, also a Police Patrol Wagon (such as is used by the police department in Chicago and a correct fac-simile of the wagon used in the Haymarket Riots,) drawn by a span of blooded horses, and filled with police, being of the most startling and realistic nature. The play will be presented by a strong cast, including D. K. Higgins, Wm. R. Hatch, Harry Rogers, J. H. Byan, Louis Gossin, J. H. Williams, F. J. Starr, and George Waldron, Amy Russell, Susie Howard and Lizzie Conway will be staged under the personal supervision of the author, Mr. Higgins.

PARK THEATRE.

Neil Burgess is making a big hit in "The County Fair" at the Park Theatre in Boston, and his support is good throughout. The house is filled at every performance. The horse race shown on the stage is very realistic, and a feature of human nature is strikingly illustrated, in Miss Abby's view of mortgages and certain moral questions in their bearing upon reforms. Burgess's Miss Abby rivals his Widow Bedott.

Wun Lung.

This is the queer name of a Chinese laundryman in Hartford, but he has probably two lungs, like most of us. Some crying babies seem to have a dozen. Lungs should be sound, or the voice will have a weakly sound. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery makes strong lungs, drives the cough away, generates good blood, tones the nerves, builds up the human wreck and makes "another man" of him. Night-sweats, blood-spitting, short breath, bronchitis, asthma, and all alarming forerunners of Consumption, are positively cured by this unapproachable remedy. If taken in time, Consumption itself can be baffled.

LITERARY NOTES.

Among the notable features announced for publication in the September number of the North American Review are: "Anecdotes of English Clergymen," by the Hon. C. K. Tuckerman, late Minister to Greece, "A Plea for Railway Consolidation" by C. P. Huntington, President of the Central Pacific Railway; a reply to Goldwin Smith's article on "New Light on the Jewish Question" by an author who writes under the name of Isaac Besht Bendavid; The story of Cushing and the Albenmarle, by the late Admiral Porter; "Dogs and their Affections" by Ouida; "The Ideal Sunday" by the Rev. C. H. Eaton; "Co-operative Womanhood in the State" by Mrs. Mary A. Livermore; and "Hayti and the United States" by the Hon. Frederick Douglass, late Minister to Hayti. These are but part of the contents announced.

Palmer Cox has signed a contract with The Ladies' Home Journal whereby his amusing little "Brownies," which he has made so marvelously successful in St. Nicholas and in his books, will hereafter belong exclusively to the Journal. Mr. Cox's contract begins with the October number, for which he has drawn the first of an entirely new series of adventures of his "funniest little men in the world."

Miss Alice M. Fletcher, of the United States Interior Department and the Peabody Museum, Cambridge, will contribute to The Century in 1892 the results of her studies of the American Indian in a series of illustrated papers. They will give an intimate account of how the Indian actually lives and thinks, his music, home life, warfare, hunting customs, etc., and it is the opinion of Prof. Putnam of Harvard that they will undoubtedly be the most important papers that have ever been published on the subject, and that they will give an entirely different idea of the Indian from that now commonly prevailing. The series will be called "The Indian's Side."

Wolcott Balestier, who has collaborated with Rudyard Kipling in the new novel which The Century will publish, is a young American now living in London. He is a writer and business man as well, being a member of the recently organized firm of Heinemann & Balestier, of Leipzig, which is publishing a series of copyrighted English and American novels on the continent of Europe in the fashion of the Tauchnitz editions.

The Department of Publicity and Promotion of the World's Columbian Exposition have made an arrangement with the North American Review for the publication of a series of advertisements of the World's Fair. The matter for the advertisements is to be supplied every month by the Department, and the series will give to the advertising pages of the Review for some time to come an interest never before possessed by the advertising pages of a monthly magazine. The first advertisement will appear in the September number of the Review.

The Arena portfolio of distinguished personages is an interesting publication and one that will make a valuable addition to the library. It is also within the range of Holiday gift prices, costing but $4, or it will be furnished together with a year's subscription to the Arena for $5.20. Orders should be addressed to Arena Publishing Co., Boston, Mass.

The McKinley picnic is a most unique gathering, and Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper this week tells of the strange incident connected with it. Every one in Ohio and from Ohio should buy this number, while those who have never taken part in an Ohio campaign should buy a copy just to see what it looks like. The interest in Professor Totten's Millennium articles remains unabated, and the publishers now announce his seven articles for 40 cents. Arkell & Harrison have also become the agents for the professor's famous books on the Millennium.

Louis Mallett of Georgetown met with a serious accident while boarding a train at Haverhill Bridge station, recently. He slipped from the step and a wheel passed over his left foot, crushing it badly. He was taken to the hospital where it was found necessary to amputate the member at the ankle. Mr. Mallett was employed by W. M. Brewster. He is about 30 years of age and has a wife and one child.

Attention! Everybody!!

Do you love a cool and refreshing drink of Soda or Moxie? If you do, call for one of Stevens' Best. We can furnish you six days in the week, but on the seventh you will have to go dry. We have at our store all of the stations of both electric and horse cars running in and out of Peabody; but on the seventh day, or Sunday, you will be obliged to stand out of door in the heat or the rain as the case might be, as we have had a notice served on us by the so-called Law and Order League of Peabody, denying us the right to sell Soda, Confectionery, Cigars or Tobacco on that day. Therefore, we were obliged to close as we could not furnish, could not keep open.

COD BLESS PEABODY!!

She needs it! 10,000 inhabitants and not a hotel or public house in the place! No inducements for strangers to visit us! No wonder our business is dull! No wonder our factories lay idle, our tanneries shut up and all business at a standstill! What we want is liberal sentiment and not littleness of mind! Then we shall grow and prosper as other Towns round about us.

Don't think we are losing courage at this state of affairs. We hope to see them righted and to live to see the good old Town once more redeemed and made prosperous as in the days gone by.

We have a large and fine stock of goods in our store, and we shall try to sell you as cheap as elsewhere. All fruits in their season. Choice Cigars, Confectionery, Tobacco and a thousand things too numerous to mention.

Will try to give you a lunch as well as we know how.

Polite clerks always in attendance.

The veterans of the 4th Massachusetts Regiment met in Lawrence on Tuesday, when 130 reported in person. A river trip to Pine Island was a feature of the reunion. Maj. Geo. S. Merrill presided, and speeches were made by Mayor Collins, Hon. Elijah A. Morse, Col. Parsons, Lt. Col. Colby, Capt. Rawlins and others.

The twenty-sixth annual reunion of the Thirty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteers was held at Haverhill Thursday, the anniversary of the battle of Antietam, in which the regiment suffered a terrible loss in a charge over the stone bridge at Antietam Creek. Three days previous, at the battle of South Mountain, the first engagement of the regiment, its Colonel, afterward General Edward A. Wilde, who died recently, lost his arm.

The contest over the will of the late Thomas Wentworth Pierce, the millionaire railway magnate, has been transferred from the courts of Essex county to the Supreme Court, Suffolk county and on Tuesday forenoon the court room was filled with attorneys, representing the numerous parties in interest. The present suit is a bill in equity against Charles Babbidge and the other executors of the will of Mr. Pierce, brought for the purpose of having the court decide as to whether certain legacies to the children of the testator are entitled to priority over other legacies, the assets of the estate being insufficient to pay all legacies in full. The estate of the deceased is valued at about $1,250,000 and the total of the legacies is about $2,000,000. If the Court decides that the children's legacies are entitled to priority, the rest of the legatees will get little or nothing, as the gifts to the former aggregate about $1,250,000. The case will be reserved for the full bench. The suit to remove the executors which had several lengthy hearings in Salem, is still pending, but will await the decision in the present case, and it is stated by counsel will probably be settled without further litigation.

Burglaries have been pretty frequent in Essex during the past few days. On Thursday night the Falls railroad station was broken into, but nothing of value was carried off. On Friday night the store of Geo. F. Burnham was broken into and a lot of clothing and other things taken away. Mr. Burnham estimates the loss at $300. The same night a farm hand at the house of Geo. A. Gorton had $187 stolen from his pocket by a fellow workman, who immediately skipped. Mr. Alvah Knowlton had his watch and chain stolen by a Swede who has been in his employ, and is now among the missing.

FIREMEN'S MUSTER.

Peabody Did Nobly But Failed to Bear Off the Palm.

About two hundred and fifty men from Peabody attended the firemen's muster at Lowell Wednesday. The event was one of the most successful ever undertaken by firemen and everything conspired to make it so. The weather was perfect, the arrangements could not have been improved upon and the parade was good and not too long. There were 2,500 men in line, each association hauling its tub. Most of the veterans wore the traditional red shirt and dark trousers. The Charlestown association paraded nearly 400 men in that dress. The handsomest engine in the whole procession was the Cambridge tub, which was elaborately painted and set off by plated mountings, but it threw one of the poorest streams of the lot. Marblehead was far behind, playing less than 180 feet. There was no wind at any time and every company had a fair chance.

A local interest is attached to the muster by reason of the contest between the Peabody tub and the old Volunteer engine, formerly owned in town but now belonging to Central Falls, R. I., association. The Torrent is a Hunneman tub, and the Volunteer is a Buttor. Intense rivalry always existed between the friends of the two engines, but the Torrent has always been considered the better machine and at all musters, with one or two exceptions, has distanced the Volunteer. There was great interest in the trials Wednesday and many bets were made on the result. The Volunteer, which looks just the same as she did the day she left Peabody, was the ninth on the list to play, and the Torrent was the fourteenth. Next came the Roxbury machine, which, a year ago or more, challenged the Torrent to play her for $500, and then backed down when Peabody accepted the challenge. The tub was out of it Wednesday. The Central Falls boys did a shrewd thing when they got Ira A. Burnham, foreman of the Volunteer, to run her. Many of her Peabody friends were on the brakes. By one of those little tricks of closing the gate through which the water is drafted into the tank, the Volunteer carried off the first prize by playing over 200 feet, beating her own record and everything else on the grounds. The Peabody boys made five trials in the fifteen minutes allowed them, but could not reach 200 feet. All the playing was good, and some fine records were made. There were four prizes and Peabody came in fifth, just losing her reward of merit. The usual protests were made before the judges, and an attempt was made to bar out the Volunteer, but all claims were disallowed. The following is the record.

Passengers Kick.

A loud protest is being made against the Naumkeag street railway for the unnecessary amount of track taken up at one time on the Danvers branch. Yesterday passengers were obliged to walk from Holly street to the Gardner farm to make the required change of cars. An elderly gentleman on one of the cars had to be carried the distance on a passing leather wagon, being unable to walk.—Salem Evening News.

What Shall the Harvest Be?

Why! What can it be, but suffering and sorrow, disease and death if you the symptoms of a disordered liver? Take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It outsells all other remedies. Sold under conditions that it must either benefit or cure the money paid for it will be promptly returned. It cures all diseases arising from deranged liver, or from impure blood, as biliousness, "liver complaint," all skin and scalp diseases, salt-rheum, tetter, scrofulous sores and swellings, fever-sores, hip-joint disease and kindred ailments.

The Lynn & Boston Railway has accepted the electric franchise granted by the Selectmen. They now desire a relocation of some of their turnouts, to enable them to make fifteen minutes time when desirable. It is proposed to run half-hour time regularly when the line is equipped and the time to Lynn will be reduced from fifty to forty minutes.

DO YOU LOVE YOUR CHILD?

Gracie Gilman lives in Dexter, Me., and she is the light of her little home. A short time ago she began to fail. The glow of health left her cheeks—they became colorless. She grew nervous. Could not sleep well, would groan and cry out in her sleep for hours at a time. No appetite. The Death Angel drew near, but the Rescue was at hand—DANA'S SARSAPARILLA gave her a good appetite; brought the roses back to her cheeks and gave her refreshing sleep and the father and mother are very grateful for it. Do you wonder at it?

Hearts are breaking with agony every day as the little arms clasp papa's and mama's for the last time.

Our price has always been $5.00 without deviation; and for two years we have done so. We shall probably never sell clubs again, their day having gone by, but there are many who do not care during these dull times to pay so much as $5.00 a dozen for pictures, but who still want the best. As we wish to reach this class, but do not believe in charging two prices for the same thing, we have decided to adopt the medium price of $4.00 for a short time. The quality of work will be the same as heretofore.

Trial of Hydrants at the Alms House.

The Board of Engineers, members of the Water Board and Board of Overseers of the Poor, assisted by the members of the Fire Department, tested the two new hydrants connected with the high pressure water mains recently extended to the Alms House, on Tuesday afternoon.

At 2 o'clock one of N. M. Quint's barges, containing the officials and a number of private citizens interested in the affair, started from Central Station on Lowell street, for the Alms House and upon arrival attached a hose to each of the two hydrants, giving a thorough series of tests with several sizes of nozzles, drawing from both together and also from each separately.

With the single tests streams were easily thrown over the house and out buildings, clearing the ridge-poles by several feet, and with hose drawing from both hydrants at the same time streams were thrown sufficiently high to demonstrate that in case of fire they could be used to good advantage.

The water pressure at the alms house, taken on a Saturday forenoon, recently, with the water in the stand pipe on Buxton's Hill at about its usual height for that day and hour, was fairly pounds, which would indicate that in the night time, ordinarily, the pressure would be considerably greater.

One hydrant, enclosed in a small shed, where 3-inch hose and a number of nozzles are kept in readiness for use, is located on the easterly side of the drive way at a point nearly opposite the house, and the second is similarly situated in relation to the barn that stands directly in the rear of the house, and with hose and nozzles kept in a shed near by, protects all of the out-buildings. About 500 feet of 3-inch linen hose is kept upon the premises, and in the house a stand pipe has been placed, to which is attached 2-inch hose, coiled up ready for use on each landing.

After the trial of the water service, which was considered by the experts quite satisfactory, the party was taken over the premises by Chairman Warren Trask of the Board of Overseers.

The house was found to be in excellent condition in every respect, all the conveniences being at hand that the age and architectural design of the building would permit of. In the basement are the dining rooms for the inmates, separate rooms being used for male and female inmates. Here, too, is the kitchen, laundry, men's smoking room and barber shop, and five cells in which male inmates sleep who are not considered proper to occupy general apartments. These cells are provided with comfortable iron bedsteads with web springs, and the doors can be secured when necessary by attendants, but that seldom has to be done. On the main floor are the hospital, sleeping apartments, and convenient lavatories fitted with copper lined bath tubs and supplied with hot and cold water, one on either side of the house, for use of male and female inmates respectively. In the front part of the building are the apartments of the Keeper and Matron and a reception room. On the second floor are sleeping apartments containing each four iron beds with web springs and on the third floor is a large dormitory with ten beds of the same style as the others.

The house is so as divided as to bring all the rooms for men on one side and those for women on the other, and from each landing exits lead to a substantial iron fire escape which extends to the ground, so there is no apparent danger of injury from its use in an emergency.

While in the dining room cook Geo. Kezar exhibited some bread and other farinaceous food prepared for the inmates, which appeared sweet and wholesome.

Hominy Gems.

BY MRS. D. A. LINCOLN,

Author Boston Cook Book.

Mix 2 table-sp. fine, uncooked hominy, 1/2 tea sp. salt, 1 table-sp. butter, and 1 cup boiling water. Place this over the tea kettle until the hominy absorbs all the water. Pour 1 cup boiling milk on 1 scant cup fine yellow corn meal; add 2 table-sp. sugar and the hominy. Let it cool slightly, then add the yolks of 2 eggs beaten to a light froth, then the whites beaten stiff. Stir in 1 level tea sp. Cleveland's baking powder and bake at once in hot buttered gem pans, about 20 minutes. A scant cup of cold boiled hominy may be used instead of the fresh hominy. It should be sifted through a squash strainer, to free it from lumps.—(Copyright, 1891, by Cleveland Baking Powder Co.)

Use only Cleveland's baking powder, the proportions are made for that.

Peculiar Expectations About Death.

A curious study in which a newspaper friend of mine is indulging is that of determining the character of the opinions that many men of many minds entertain in regard to the time and manner of their own deaths. The result of his study is certainly interesting, to say the least. One of the foremost men in politics in this state firmly believes that he will die by a bullet. He has no reason for that belief except the unexplainable presentiment that he has carried about with him all his life.

Even when he was a boy he was fascinated with the idea, and he always believed that when his time came he would die by a bullet, and rather viewed the matter complacently. Nevertheless, he went to the wars, and, besides, he has fought two duels and been an officer of the government in the detection and arrest of moonshiners, and although his life has been in imminent peril many times, he has never been touched by a bullet.

Another man, one of the brightest newspaper men in Boston, believes that he will die of pneumonia. Still another gentleman, a physician of great skill and a scholar of much reputation, believes that he will be suffocated. He has an idea that he will be hanged in some accidental way, and if you should talk to him about this you would find that he is painfully in earnest, and really permits his strange presentiment to seriously disturb him. —Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

"Which, of course, you refused!" cried the young man indignantly.

"He assured us that he is the owner of mining claims worth several hundred thousand dollars."

"What, father," interrupted Leon, "can it be you entertained his proposition?"

"Gently, gently, my son!" said Morel. "I'm wiser than you in these worldly matters. Captain Roberts is a man of position and power in the province and a dangerous man to have for an enemy. I tried not to offend him. I thrust myself down and told him that a farmer's daughter would not make a proper wife for a British officer of rank and wealth."

"Thank heaven," ejaculated Leon, "that you were strong enough to do this, father! But how did it all end?"

"He grew violent," replied Mr. Morel, "and warned me to have a care how I made enemies in this wild and desperate country. 'When it once became known,' said he, 'that Captain Roberts has been accepted as the future husband of Miss Pauline, you and your family will be as safe in the province as you would be in your native village.' He then promised to give you valuable information as to the location of mining claims, guaranteeing that you would return home a millionaire within a year's time. To all these brilliant promises I returned a firm but respectful answer that the proposed alliance was impossible. Whereupon, thinking to make a bold strike for the coveted prize, Roberts called out: 'Well, friend Morel, this way of deciding things may be French fashion, but it is not our English way. Let Miss Pauline have a word to say. She has assured me that her heart is entirely free.'"

"At this," continued Morel, "our little Pauline turned very red, but I agreed to the proposition, and calling her to my side told her to decide her own fate. She fixed her eyes on Captain Roberts' face, which became very pale as he met Pauline's steady, honest look.

"I'm grateful for the honor, Captain Roberts," said she quietly, "but it cannot be. I love—another."

"Brave little Pauline!" cried Leon. "Spoken like a true Alsatian, but who the deuce?"

Morel raised his hand and motioned to his son to keep silence, and then continued, "When Roberts heard these words he broke out fiercely:

"Love another? What, can it be possible that you have allowed this unknown adventurer, who happened to save you from the grizzly— Roberts paused, fairly choking with rage, while our Pauline grew redder and redder. 'Some desperado from the states,' he blurted out, 'low riffraff that has drifted into the province since the gold was discovered. Morel, you're a fool, you're a madman! Get your ways! I wish you luck with your new son-in-law. He'll be a credit to you!' and seizing his horse's reins, he swung himself in the saddle and rode off."

"We've made a dangerous enemy," cried Leon, "but we're honest folk, and have nothing to fear from anybody!"

"Roberts may not be as bad as his reputation," said Morel. "I'm told he has a son and daughter in the province, and that it's the son's influence with the government which keeps the father in command of the mounted police."

"Come, come," exclaimed Madam Morel, testily, "are you men never coming to dinner. Everything is getting cold. I've cooked a stick full of tortillas for you, Leon, and for you, papa, I've got a lovely mess of pigjoree (bacon and rice), so come one and come all and let little Pauline's lovers take care of themselves."

There was a hearty laugh at Pauline's expense, and the family gathered around the table, which was formed by setting a stake under the tailboard of the pack wagon. Leon had much to tell them about his mine and how he was a land owner in the province. Turning to his father, he cried out:

"If we strike it rich, little papa, I shall yet be a French senator."

"And what shall I be, hey?" inquired Morel, "plain Alsatian farmer, I suppose, with no other duty than to be proud of his son and say to everybody he meets: 'Have you read Senator Morel's last speech? That's my son, you know.'"

"How nicely a bottle of bon ordinaire would go with this pigjoree!" cried out Leon.

"Ah, dear old France," murmured Madam Morel. "I wonder when we shall see her again!"

"What, homesick already, little mother?" inquired Pauline. "Why, I think this is a beautiful country."

"Fine country for grizzlies," said Leon, at which Pauline's dark eyes were quickly lowered and a deep blush mantled her sweet girlish face.

"Let her alone, you men," cried Madam Morel, "why shouldn't she be grateful to her rescuer?"

"Gratitude, mother," replied Leon. "Lives next door to."

But Pauline's little hand stopped his mouth.

The rest of the day was passed in looking over their mining outfit and laying plans for beginning work on Leon's claim. The sun had set behind the towering larches and its golden light gilded the wonderful red barked trees of the forest. On the distant ridge the pines stood like columns of flame beneath the glory of the sunset. The whole sky glowed with wondrous tints of yellow and scarlet. The laughter and gaiety of the light hearted Morels were hushed at sight of this glorious sunset. Suddenly the sound of a horse's hoofs reached their ears and the next moment a scarlet coated officer of the police force rode up to the little camp. Touching his hat respectfully he said:

"I'm looking for Louis and Leon Morel, father and son."

"Here we are," cried Morel, stepping forward. Pauline uttered a low cry of half fear, half surprise, and clung to her mother with deep, anxiety pained on her face. Morel raised his hand toward the two women, and said in a quiet tone, "Be calm," then turning to the officer he continued:

"What is your business with us, sir?"

"I hold a warrant for your arrest," was the reply.

"Our arrest?" repeated Morel. This is not Bismarckland. What are we accused of? Let me see the warrant."

The officer handed the paper to the Frenchman, who glanced it over.

"Horse stealing!" he exclaimed, as the blood mantled his face and neck. "This is infamous. We are honest people."

"Yes, we are honest people!" cried Madam Morel, stepping forward and facing the police officer.

Morel laid his hand gently on his wife's shoulder. "This is not a matter for women to settle," he murmured; then approaching the officer, he informed him that their horses were tethered some distance away and that his son would bring them in. "We shall be ready to follow you in a short half hour," added Morel.

The officer nodded his approval. Pauline's eyes were filled with tears as her father led her and her mother aside and spoke a few words of comfort and encouragement to them.

"Fear nothing," said he, "no harm will come to us. We shall be back in a day or so. This is not Bismarckland, I tell you! Close the packwagon securely at night and see that your pistols are close at hand. But you'll not need them. Women are sacred in this country. If a wolf comes prowling around in the night use my Winchester, Pauline. Take good care of little mamma. Goodby, goodby!"

The three men rode away and Pauline and her mother stood watching them until their forms faded out of sight in the dark shadows cast by the towering pines which lined the road.

"Don't tremble, little mother!" cried Pauline bravely, for she felt her heart grow strong at thought of the glaring injustice that had been done her father and brother. "They'll soon come back to us. Hector and I'll take good care of you. You know I've killed a deer and Leon says I'm as good a shot with a pistol as he is."

Madam Morel smiled at her daughter's cheering words and replied: "I don't fear four footed enemies, my child. There's another kind far more dangerous."

"Oh, you mean men, little mamma!" cried Pauline with a laugh. "Pshaw, everybody says a woman is safer in the province than she would be in the streets of a large city. Just recollect how you and I have been treated since we left Seattle. Why, the men act as if we were real angels. I saw one of them pick up a bit of cloth that I tore off the sleeve of my dress and tie it in his buttonhole 'for luck,' as he called it."

Madam Morel drew her pretty daughter to her side in a warm embrace. "I'm not afraid of either

BY THE courtesy of Mr. Charles B. Haven, we publish today a letter from Captain Beadle, which we trust will be found interesting by many of our readers, coming as it does from a former townsman and one who has had abundant opportunity to observe the characteristics of the Sandwich Islands, which locality forms the subject of the communication.

THE BEVERLY Times is soon to be enlarged. A new cylinder press is being installed to facilitate the change. We are pleased to note this sign of prosperity. Bro. Vittum gives his readers what they want and by faithful attention to business has built up the paper very materially since it came into his hands.

THE TIME for holding the Essex County convention to nominate a County Commissioner, Clerk of Courts, Register of Deeds and County Treasurer, is set for Thursday, October 8th at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, at Lyceum Hall, Salem. Immediately thereafter, the Councillor Convention will be held.

It is said that Arthur L. Huntington Esq., ex-Mayor of Salem, a lawyer of ability and integrity, is a candidate for the office of Clerk of Courts, and while there is no reason for displacing Mr. Peabody, the present incumbent, if Mr. Huntington should prove to be the choice of the convention he will make a strong candidate and an efficient and agreeable official.

THE FIRST gun of the Republican State campaign was fired at Boston this week, when a ratification meeting was held that filled up so full the measure of success as to wring an admission of the fact from the Boston Herald, a paper sufficiently tainted with Democracy to make the acknowledgment the more gratifying.

Col. Allen, as the PRESS has often predicted, is arousing immense enthusiasm, and we now feel more confident than ever of a handsome majority for him on the third of November.

But the unbounded popularity of the Republican standard bearer has aroused the latent energies of the opposition, and it will not be sufficient to rest on our laurels nor content ourselves with the glamour of brass bands and flaunting banners. This is a contest where the heaviest artillery will be wheeled into position and all the reserve forces brought up on both sides and on election day all Republicans should bear constantly in mind that famous watchword that spurred on the Union forces in a memorable battle of the late war, "This day our Country expects every man to do his duty."

To our local Republicans we would suggest the necessity of the utmost effort to have every available subject registered in due season, and see that nobody is permitted to stay at home while the polls are open to receive his votes, on the first Tuesday of November. This town is allied to two districts which have been able in years past to score a victory only by perfect harmony, co-operation and faithful attention to the duty every loyal American citizen owes this grand institution, of casting an honest, intelligent ballot.

Four years ago this month the Peabody Republican Club was organized as an aid and auxiliary to the Republican Town Committee, and what service it performed in the two years of its active existence can easily be inferred, without recourse to positive proof, from the victories won during the season of its labor. Would it not be well to revive the club or form a new one and wake up the voters of Peabody this fall?

On and after Monday the cars on the Essex road leaving the Salem station on the hour and half-hour will run only to the Square. Trips leaving Salem at 9.15 and 9.45 P. M., and Peabody at 9.45 and 10.15 P. M. will be discontinued.

NORTH PACIFIC OCEAN,
AUG. 11, Ship Paotulus.
MR. AND MRS. C. B. HAVEN AND OTHERS:
DEAR FRIEND:-

We arrived at Mahukona, Hawaii, July 15, after a long passage of 61 days: long passage, because we had had fair winds, when we ought to have had fair winds most of the way: had we been bound to Honolulu, we would have reached there in the 54th day. The Ger. bk Orient, and the Peruvian bk Japan, left Hong Kong ahead of us, and the first had 71 days; and the other 77 days to Honolulu; so you can see, we did as well as our neighbors. We landed all of the passengers we took on board, with one exception. He died of pneumonia, and was buried with Christian services, by a Chinese preacher, who was one of the passengers. I think it is remarkable that no accident happened, as a child of 4 years, would have a child of 4 months or upward, clinging on its back, and go up and down the stairs, from the upper to the lower deck, and never fall, while the ship at times, had much motion. Emigrants are not desirable freight at any time; they being generally of the lower order of human beings, having no pride, or decency; but I do not think the Chinese are any worse than any of the European element, in fact I had rather have them. The Chinese wash themselves; but for all that, they are eternally looking for vermine. These we carried were from inland people who cultivate rice and sugar. Many had never seen a white woman; and when Mrs. B. came on deck they would gather together, and look at her, and make their comments in Chinese.

They were as much of a curiosity to Mrs. B. and she in return would look at them. We had 445 in all, 93 women and 66 children. We had no heavy weather, so the passage was pleasant in that respect. We sighted Oahu (war-who) on the 7th of July, and had to beat to Mahukona 175 miles, some of the time under lower topsails and courses; there is where we had the roughest weather. Mahukona is on the N. W. corner of Hawaii; and is the windiest hole I ever experienced. You know how our N. W. and E. blow, when they blow their hardest? That is the way it blows there, nearly the whole year. It is the seaport of the Kohala district; and is the beginning of the railroad to Kohala, which is nine miles and more inland.

On arrival, the Coolies, who had agreed to work for three years at $15 per month, and feed themselves, refused to sign the contract. Having arrived they thought they were free men and could do as they pleased. I could not have brought them had they signed their contract; neither would the Portuguese Authorities at Macao allowed them to go, if they had signed their contract. The planters had advanced the money, and were paying $24 per month for help. Sugar had dropped $40 per ton; and the contractor had agreed to land the men in March, and it being the middle of July it was hard on all. I could not pitch them overboard, if I had, I would now, "be in the happy hunting grounds" pursued by the spirit of the "long quod" Celestials. After much persuasion, they began to sign their contracts and on the 22nd, we were clear of all but 28. They would not sign, so I had to go to Honolulu.

Kohala is a very rich country on the windward side; being in the tropics, with the N. E. wind blowing on it most of the year, bringing moisture, from the ocean, which striking the mountains, condenses the vapor, pouring the water in streams, down the mountain side, part of it sinking into the earth, reappearing in springs, and then utilized as a motive power; or allowed to run to waste; the heat starting the vegetation, making the earth a paradise. The wind blowing strong on that side, is not felt by the people, as the slope is upward; but on the crest and down on the lee side, the people know which way the wind is blowing. June, July and August is planting season, but, this season is dry, and they have not planted; in planting sugar, they cut the cane into pieces 6 inches long, and plant it horizontally. Now comes the particular part. If the season is wet, it is barely covered; if it is dry, they plant deeper, and who can tell, whether it will be wet or dry? As the cane grows it is cultivated, until it is too thick; as the leaves die, they are stripped off; and as the cane grows to 15 feet high or more, and is 21 months growing, and two years before any returns come in, it takes a large purse to run a sugar plantation of a thousand acres; when a costly mill of $50,000 has to be erected; 500 mules at $100 a head, 400 horses at $120 per head, and cattle besides, also large heavy carts besides plows and other farm implements. One plantation had over 5 miles of flume, made of planks, that water running through it should float the cane from the field to the mill, as it was cheaper than carting it.

Sugar cane fields, look much like a corn field in the distance, and it is a pretty sight to see the tops waving in the wind. The old plantations grid their cane, using the cane, after the juice is expressed, as fuel for boiling. But there is a new process of extracting juice from the cane. The cane goes through a mill where knives cut it into little pieces, these fall into a vat where steam is turned on to it, and the liquid percolates into a boiler, and the trash is dropped from the vat, and utilized as fuel; but they have to employ coal also. Although they burn the trash, I should think there was no economy in the practice as it is like punk and punk is not considered good fuel. By the old process, they have trash to spare, as they cannot consume it all. There are Portuguese from Azores, Japanese and Chinese employed on the different plantations, and many ugly ones among them; and they set fire to buildings, the trash house and sometimes to the cane field. Just imagine what a loss any of the fires occasion! Just before leaving Mahukona, the officers of the Kohala Sugar Plantations was burned, the manager losing many of his private papers, and a large map of the different fields, that cost $1000 to survey them. The books were in two safes, and were saved; they were lucky, that the sparks did not catch the trash house or the mill. You can see the planters have as much trouble with their help, as people at home do; though they are not organized into the chivalric name of "Knights of Labor," with Teddy V. Powderly as "Knight Commander." They have houses furnished them, with water and bath rooms free; and patches of ground allotted them that they may raise produce to sell, potatoes, and fruit. Chinese are inveterate gamblers, but some are very frugal.

The new process is called diffusion, and they claim they can get more sugar from the cane than the press process; granted; but, can they make it more profitable? I leave them to answer that question. The old planters cannot afford to erect a new mill, and buy coal at high price, to test that point.

There is a new mill in process of erection, on the island of Oahu, which I visited one afternoon; they expect it to be finished ready for work in November; they will have to "dust" to do it; they have erected large pumping stations to irrigate the fields, and have spared no expense to make it a success. I sat in the seat of the car, on the ride in to Honolulu, with the Agent of the plantation, a very pleasant man. I am in hopes to visit Honolulu again, as I wish to visit that mill, and see it in operation. In two hours from the time they squeeze juice, they have sugar. This is the Ewa Sugar Mill Co.

The Hawaiian Islands, formerly known as the Sandwich Islands, were visited by Cook and others. Hawaii, the most southern is the largest; and Cook and some others of noted pirates, of that time, the latter part of the last century, made Kamehameha (Car me ha me ha) a present of a cannon, and powder and shot. This wild Hawaiian, conceived the idea of subjugating the surrounding natives, and become a King. He began with Mani, Lanai, Molokai, and landed on Oahu, at Honolulu, (Peaceful harbor) The harbor is protected with reefs, with a narrow passage, for entrance.

They landed and planted their terror; the natives assembled in defence; they fired their weapon of destruction, killing some and frightening the rest from he landing, up between the high hills, is a beautiful valley called Nuuanu; up this valley fled the terrified natives, with "Come here, Come here" in full pursuit, up the whole distance of seven miles, until they came to a level near the very top, to the Pala (pal a); which means precipice; here the old warrior, loaded up his gun, and fired into the assembled crowd, with a precipice of hundreds of feet in the rear. He fired killing some, and many going over the precipice, to be dashed to death, on the rocks below. Imagine the effect of the report of that gun, echoing repeatedly by the many angles of those huge rocky hills, upon the ears of those simple people, who never heard the like before! It must have been awful. He was a victor. Who couldn't be a warrior? He was Kame ha me ha the 1st; and I think there were four more of that name. There is a large statue, larger than life size, standing in the yard of the government buildings, with his right hand extended, his left, holding a spear with the handle resting near his left foot, with a flowing cloak from his neck to his heels, and a strip of cloth to cover his nakedness; and black! Ebony is white to him. The aforesaid cloak and clothing are guilDED. The last of his race is no more; (that is in the King line) Kamehameha pretending to be, but was not; the pure Kanaea having straight hair, while Kamehameha was as kinkey as a negroes. Presumably some negro cook of a vessel was the father of Kalakau. Showing of what, kings are sometimes made.

The present Queen, sister of Kalakau, Liliuokalani has kinkey hair, and negro features; I speak from an engraving I saw of her, in the superior court house. She was at home part of the time, I was in Honolulu, and part of the time she went to visit the other islands. When she travels, she goes in the coasting steamers, and they generally carry cattle on deck, as freight, as she has no royal yacht, her band of musicians accompanying her; and as the steamers start at all hours she has to accommodate herself to their movements, or pay for loss of time. You can see in what esteem royalty is held in this kingdom. There was an insurrection not long before the late king died, instigated by his sister, the present Queen, but, it was badly managed, and was of short duration. The heir apparent to the throne, is in England, and her father a Scotchman Mr. Cleghorn has gone to bring her to Honolulu. I was informed, that it was the general opinion, when she died, it would be a Republic. The United States element is so strong in the islands that they govern it; the English are trying to stir up strife, and teaching the Kanakas to cry "Hawaii for the Hawaiians." But I think from what I was told, the Americans were too strong.

The McKinley bill has hurt the islands seriously, as the treaty with Hawaiians, gave them free entry of sugar into the United States; and when sugar was admitted free it knocked $40 a ton off the Hawaiian's sugar; and as there are many planters, who have no mill to make sugar, and have to pay to the millers 7-16 of their sugar for making, it will bankrupt them. The planters tell me labor at $15 per month is too high, they cannot afford to raise sugar, that the government will have to modify the immigration laws, and allow the Chinese to come in at will, until the country is flooded, and labor will be cheap. I think that will be poor policy, as it is a known fact in all countries where the Chinese have settled, they have become pests, and laws had to be made to prohibit their coming into the country. I did not hold those views when I left home, and perhaps you do not; but, I have learned something of the Chinese question since I have been in the China trade; and I see the wisdom of abolishing them from the country. "For ways that are dark, and tricks that are vain, the heathen Chinese are peculiar." Honolulu is pleasantly located in a temperature of 80 or thereabouts, on a level plateau at the foot of the mountains, it has many fine residence with beautiful grounds surrounding them thoroughly tropical with the variety of noble palms towering aloft, bearing their different fruits or giving their welcome shade. The cocoa, the date, and the fan are quite prominent. The fig, mangoes, tamarinds, oranges, guavas, pine apples, rose apples, papai water melon and musk are among the fruits grown. But give me the apples and pears of old Essex County they are good enough for me. Cabbages, summer squash, tomatoes, Irish potatoes and sweet, beans, cucumbers, lettuce, two are among the vegetables. There are many Americans among the inhabitants, one of them being Brown Dodge's nephew, who has been here years in the government employ as surveyor I had the pleasure of meeting some Duxbury people one of whom I was acquainted with while at home. So you find I meet friends all over the world.

One Sunday a friend took Mrs. B. and me to ride up this Muauu valley to the Pali, it being one of the favorite drives, we started with a turnout, something like Mr. Nelson on Chestnut street used to drive, the horse did not have the speed of Mr. Nelson's, but were very good. Many horses are imported from San Francisco. The day was lovely, and a gentle breeze blew down the valley and kept us quite comfortable, we started from the water front, and passed the many China shops, which were open for business, leaving them we pass the beautiful residences of the wealthy with beautiful grounds in the best taste. We ascended to the fern region, passing on our way the night blooming cereus and other of the cacti species. We passed one bunch of the night blooming cereus on a stone wall, covered with buds and flowers for 100 feet long—a beautiful sight. We then came to a sort of grotto where cacti, ferns, vines and other plants I know not the name of, stood out in majestic beauty, that caused us to pause in wonderment. I have not the gift of language to describe it; it must be seen to be appreciated. We passed the foliage and came to the plain where the poor natives made a stand a century ago, and lost all through the thoughtlessness of the white man. We walked to the top of the hill; we could see the Pacific Ocean to the N. E.; we could see it to the S. W. At the bottom of

Is that impurity of the blood which produces unsightly lumps or swellings in the neck; which causes running sores on the arms, legs, or feet; which develops ulcers in the eyes, ears, or nose, often causing blindness or deafness; which is the origin of pimples, cancerous growths, or "humors," which, fastening upon the lungs, causes consumption and death. It is the most ancient of all diseases, and very few persons are entirely free from it.

How Can It Be CURED

By taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which, by the remarkable cures it has accomplished, has proven itself to be a potent and peculiar medicine for this disease. If you suffer from scrofula, try Hood's Sarsaparilla.

"Every spring my wife and children have been troubled with scrofula, my little boy, three years old, being a terrible sufferer. Last spring he was one mass of sores from head to foot. We all took Hood's Sarsaparilla, and all have been cured of the scrofula. My little boy is entirely free from sores, and all four of my children look bright and healthy." W. B. Fire broke out this morning about 1 o'clock, in the barn of Robert R. Emerson on Lynn street, South Peabody. The barn contained a large store of hay which with the building was destroyed. Damage was about $500. There was an insurance of $500 placed through the agency of O. B. Chadwick and Co. The cause of the fire is unknown, but is thought to have been set.

The advance sale of tickets to the Carl Pierce concert next Wednesday evening has been very large, and those wishing to attend and have not secured tickets should do so at once. Carl Pierce is acknowledged to be the best violin player in America today and the individual members of the club which support Mr. Pierce are all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and first-class soloists. The entertainment as a whole will be one of the best ever given in town.

Chief Pansley with Officers Sweeney, Crowley, Mack, McManus and Phelan, and accompanied by the Lynn city marshal, who gave them the clue, visited Bartholomew's pond, Sunday and surprised a party of about twenty Lymmites some of whom had, to all appearances, been fighting. The officers captured two or three kegs of beer and might have brought away a wagon load of inebriates who would all have been put on probation and the officers would have had their labor, and the expense attending it, for nothing.

Mrs. Simpson, who resides with her husband in the old boarding house on Tremont street, near Thomas E. Proctor's tannery, attempted suicide this forenoon by hanging herself with two pocket handkerchiefs. Men in the tannery heard screams and rushed to the house and broke open the door with an axe, when she was discovered suspended as described. She was at once cut down and her husband, the police and Dr. Foster were summoned. She was uninjured and it is thought she will not repeat the experiment. Family troubles caused the rash act.

It is not the selling price alone, that must be considered, in arriving at a knowledge of the value of an article. There is as much real pure soap in a bar of Dobbins' Electric as in four bars of any other soap made, and it will, if used according to directions, do four times as much work as any other. Its cost is but a very slight advance on that of inferior soap. Insist upon Dobbins' Electric I. L. CRAGIN & CO., Philadelphia, Pa.

Wallace Drew, foreman at the town farm, met with a serious accident Thursday morning. He was superintending the running of the corn cutter, a machine which chops up the corn stalks for the silo where the corn is made into ensilage, when the machine broke and threw off the box covering the wheel to which the knife is attached. Drew was struck in the face by some part of the machine, not the knife, and was badly gashed on the cheek and chin. A physician was at once telephoned for who attended to the man's injuries, which, although severe, are not expected to be attended with severe results.

Carry the news to Mary.

And, pray, be not too long.

For she is fast declining.

And, surely, 'twould be wrong—not to tell her of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. We do want Mary to know, in some way or other, that this world-famed remedy will cure her beyond any doubt! It's just the medicine for young womanhood, and thousands has it bridged over that perilous sea.

From every State, from every city, from nearly every neighborhood in this broad land, comes the grateful acknowledgement of what it has done and is doing for our daughters. The only medicine for the distressing and painful irregularities and weaknesses of woman, sold with a positive guarantee to give satisfaction in every case, or money refunded. In other words, sold on trust!

The first three named were authorized delegates and the remainder of the party went as interested spectators and to enjoy the autumnal beauties of that famous resort.

"Away! Away! There is danger here! A terrible phantom is bending near: With no human look, with no human breath, He stands beside thee—the haunter—Death!"

If there is one disease more than another that comes like the unbidden guest at a banquet, it is Catarrh. Insidiously it steals upon you, "with no human breath" it gradually, like the octopus, winds its coils about you and crushes you. But there is a medicine, called Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, that can tear you away from the monster, and turn the sythes' point of the reaper. The makers of this wonderful remedy offer, in good faith, a standing reward of $500 for an incurable case of Catarrh in the Head.

A lecture will be given October 14, in Town Hall by "the colored silver tongued orator"—Rev. John H. Hector of San Francisco, who before the proclamation of emancipation was a slave. The subject will be reminiscences of the war of the rebellion. The lecture is under the auspices of the W. C. T. U., but is not a temperance lecture in any sense, the object being to replenish the exchequer of the organization. Mr. Samuel Trask bears the expenses, and if there is any profit pays it to the association. Several benevolent people have contributed small sums to help defray the expenses. Tickets will be sold at 10 cents. No reserved seats. Children will be given a prize for selling the largest number of tickets.

A poster has been sent into town from North Reading which we copy below verbatim, and leave our readers to pass their own judgement upon its propriety:

$5000 reward! (wanted by the North Reading high school.) A terrible murder in the quiet village of North Reading. The victim a fair-haired, blushing young girl! The murderer worse than Frank C. Almy the said Almy will be tried before the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts held in the Flint Memorial Hall, Monday, Sept. 28, North Reading, Mass. Two of the greatest lawyers in the state will appear for the Commonwealth. One whose name is a terror to every wrong doer in North Reading and in Middlesex County. The other's name is known in every State in the Union and in many foreign countries. Two "younger Knights of less renown" will buckel on their Stirrups and with the sharp point of the lance, champion the cause of the "injured" Almy. New and startling evidence will be introduced! A whole "corps" of witnesses. Jury to be taken from the audience. Come all armed to the teeth (with 25 cents) and we will settle it once and forever with Almy, alias Abbott. Remember the day, Monday, Sept. 28. Rain or shine.

the hill to the east, in the far distance we could see the sugar plantation of Mr. Cumins, the smoke stack of the mill house looking quite small, the depth being so great. We returned to where the carriage was, unhitched the horses, and rode down the valley seven miles, the wind being behind, and the sun in the zenith, it was quite warm; but by 12 o'clock we were on board the good Pictolus, where under the awning, on top of the house, we lay back in our bamboo lounge chairs we brought from China, with a comfortable breeze blowing around us, we thought of the pleasant forenoon we had enjoyed, when the steward rang the bell summoning us to dinner. We had many pleasant calls, and made many friends, whom we would be pleased to see again in any part of the world. But with all this beauty, and pleasant climate, and gifts of nature, there is one serious objection: Leprosy! Leprosy everywhere! You scarcely know who has it. There is a leper settlement at Molokai, where the lepers are sent, but many never reach there, for before the authorities find it out they are sent away by friends to California, Puget Sound, China and elsewhere. It is a fearful disease; and once smitten there is no help. I heard Mr. Stephen H. Phillips in the Salem depot, speak of the Chinese in anything but a favorable light, just after his return from Honolulu, where he had been Attorney-General. Knowing you are tired of reading by this time, I will close, thanking you for allowing me to inflict you with this lengthy epistle. I remain

NEWS SUMMARY.

The failure of cereal crops in Europe is now said to threaten more disastrous famine than has heretofore been calculated. It is estimated that with an export of 225,000,000 bushels from the United States and Canada, a deficiency of nearly an equal amount and possibly double that quantity may be found to exist. The failure of the potato crop in Ireland adds another shade of gloom to the prospect.

On Sunday morning a fire in a dwelling at Boston Highlands resulted in the death of two children of Philip Cullen. Mr. Cullen, with his wife and four children occupied apartments in the third story of the structure. Early Sunday morning he and his wife went out to attend devine worship, leaving the children in bed. Fire broke out in the kitchen in their absence and the two oldest girls, 5 and 7 years, were burned to death. The two younger children were rescued.

Balmaceda, who was unable to escape from Chili as was reported, committed suicide last Sunday morning in the house of the Argentine Legation at Valparaiso.

ESSEX, ss.

PROBATE COURT.

At a Probate Court helden at Salem, in and for said county of Essex, on the first Monday of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, to wit, on the eighth day of said September, being the next secular day thereafter, On the petition of JEREMIAH O'CONNELL, of Peabody, in said county, minor, by his next friend, praying that his name may be changed to that of JOSEPH O'CONNELL, public notice having been given, according to the order of Court, that all persons might appear and show cause, if any they had, why the same should not be granted, and it appearing that the reason given therefor is sufficient, and consistent with the public interest, and being satisfactory to the Court, and no objection being made,

It is decreed that his name be changed, as prayed for, to that of JOSEPH O'CONNELL, which name he shall hereafter bear, and which shall be his legal name, and that he give public notice of said change by publishing this decree once a week for three successive weeks in the newspaper called the Peabody Press, printed at Peabody, and make return to this Court under oath that such notice has been given.

PROBATE COURT.

To the Heirs at Law, next of Kin, Creditors, and all other persons interested in the estate of SIDNEY C. BANCROFT, late of Peabody, in said county, deceased:

WHEREAS, a certain instrument purporting to be the last will and testament of said deceased has been presented to said Court for Probate, by Lydia N. Cone, who prays that letters testamentary may be issued to her the executrix therein named, and that she may be exempt from giving a surety or sureties on her bond, for the reasons alleged in said petitions.

You are hereby cited to appear at a Probate Court, to be held at Salem, in said county of Essex, on the third Monday of September, next, at nine o'clock before noon, to show cause, if any you have, against the same.

And said Lydia N. Cone is hereby directed to give public notice thereof, by publishing this citation once a week, for three successive weeks, in the newspaper called the Peabody Press, printed at Peabody, the last publication to be two days at least before said Court.

A Perfect Success. VII.
The Rev. A. Antoine Refugio, of Texas, writes:
"I think Pastor Koenig's Nerve Tonic is a perfect success, for any one who suffered from a most painful nervousness as I did. I feel like myself again after taking the Tonic."

ELIZABETH N. J., March 7, 1891.
Before I took Pastor Koenig's Nerve Tonic I could not sleep nights and had a numbness of the legs, arms and sometimes all over the body, but after taking the second dose of your Nerve Tonic I could sleep well, and in three days all numbness was gone and have not felt since.

Caught in His Own Trap.

Two ministers were once conversing on extemporaneous preaching. "Well," said the elder of the two, waxing warm,
"you are running yourself by writing your sermons and reading them off.
Your congregation cannot become interested in your preaching, and if you were called upon to preach unexpectedly, unless you could get hold of an old sermon, you would be completely confused." The young divine used all his eloquence, but in vain, to convince his brother that the written sermon expressed his own thoughts and feelings and if called upon, he could preach extemporaneously. "As we are of the same faith," said he,
"suppose you try me next Sunday morning. On ascending the pulpit you can hand me a text from any part of the Bible, and I will convince you that I can preach without having looked at the text before I stood up. Likewise, I must be allowed the same privilege with you, and we will then see who will make the best of it." This idea seemed to delight the elder preacher, and it was immediately agreed upon.
The following Sabbath on mounting the pulpit, the senior brother handed the younger minister a slip, on which was written: "And the ass opened his mouth and spoke," from which the young divine preached a gloriously good sermon, chaining the attention of his delighted hearers and charming his old friend with his eloquence. For the afternoon the younger minister handed a slip to the elder. After rising and opening the Bible the old man glanced at the slip, and then in a doleful voice he read aloud, "Am I not thine ass?"
Pausing a few moments he ran his fingers through his hair, straightened his collar, blew his nose in a nervous, jerking way, and read again, "Am I not thine ass?" Another pause, during which deadly silence reigned, and again the old divine read in solemn tones, "Am I not thine ass?" Then, glancing at his friend, who sat directly behind him, he said in a sad voice, "I think I am, brother."—Sheffield (Eng.)

Bluefishing.

One of the best known and most exhilarating methods of taking the bluefish is by trolling from a sailboat with a squid of wood, bone or metal, usually accompanied by a piece of white rag or eel skin by way of additional decoy. At Woods Holl a strong cotton line about 100 yds. long, to which are attached on wire two large-sized sea bass hooks baited with a live eel, was the favorite rig until recently, when the caprice of the fish seemed to call for menhaden or some other bait. In fastening the eel, one hook was passed through the lips and the other pierced the tail. The same outfit was used from a boat at anchor near rapid currents which floated the line at or near the surface, and also for having out into the surf and pulling in the line rapidly. A very popular style of fishing, now extensively followed, is known as chumming. For this purpose many anglers use an 18-thread Cuttyhunk line 200 yds. long on a large reel and provided with a strong hook attached to about 1 ft. of piano wire.
Two things are to be especially guarded against in handling a big fish his mad rushes when first hooked and his propensity to run up faster than the reel will take in the slack line. A powerful fish with the tide in his favor will make a stubborn fight and a double issue unless great skill is exercised by the angler. In chumming a favorite bait is a piece from the back of a menhaden containing the dorsal fin, the rest of the fish being ground or chopped up and thrown overboard to attract the fish. An artificial minnow is often used from a stationary boat instead of the squid or other surface lure, and the young are caught in shallow water near the shores with shrimp or pieces of fish. One of the most successful all-round anglers of my acquaintance, Mr. Willard Nye, Jr., who is known to many of the readers of Forest and Stream, gives the following timely hint from his own experience in trolling: "The value of knowing that bluefish are feeding on the smaller fish does not seem to be fully understood by the fisherman, for with few exceptions they stick to the eelskin droll or squid, whereas if they would use an imitation fish, not over 5 in. long, made of block tin, at least three fish would be hooked to one with the eelskin droll. To meet with the greatest success the tin squid should have indentations cut or pressed to represent the head, scale and eyes;
it should be rubbed bright with the back of a knife, and have a piece of eelskin 1-2 of 2 in. long hooked through the middle to make a suitable tail for the minnow. When many trolling let the boat sail very slowly so that the droll may sink into the school of bait, as most fish prefer to take their food under water rather than come to the surface to strike it and get their mouths full of air."—Forest and Stream.

The Lost Voice.

FRED GOLDSMITH WALKER.

I missed his voice one morning, from the hallway down below,
And I knew there was trouble, for he used to warble so;
For always at the dawning, I could hear his cheerful note
Come with the sweetest thrilling, from his tender little throat.
But a feeling came within my heart, which told me he was dead,
So I hastened towards the hall-way, with each step a constant dread,
And the feeling that I'd lost him, was revealed in truth to me,
There he lay, my yellow songster, and his death, reality.
He had sung the previous morning with entire heart and soul,
And his rippling tones and cadences through house did clearly roll,
He seemed so gay and happy, for he never knew of care.
But now he lay enclosed in death—the silvered voice, oh, where!
Then I took his tiny body with the kindest soft caress,
And I smoothed the yellow feathers, and to my lips did press
That little head so cunning with the eyes so brown and small,
But the dear voice so rich and tuneful, I could never hear at all.
Many years have drifted from me, and I often think I hear
A voice so sweet and pleasant, falling soft upon my ear,
And at morning in my chamber, when I'm sitting all alone,
How I long to hear his singing, and the mellow silver tone.
And I wonder if he's warbling in a brighter home from me,
And if his voice is sweeter still in harp-like melody.
But those things I cannot answer, he is gone,
I know not where,
Though I trust it's with his Maker, in a heaven bright and fair.
Now the house seems still and solemn,
though the cage hangs as before,
And I realize with sorrow I can never hear him more,
For those happy songs so cheering, will ne'er again impart
A pleasure to my ear, and a comfort to my heart.

J. SLOAT FASSETT.

J. Sloat Fassett who has been connected with politics for a number of years was nominated on the first ballot by the Republican Convention, for Gov. of New York. Mr. Fassett represents the active aggressive sentiment of the State and his career is well known to the public. He was born at Elmira in 1853 and was graduated from the University of Rochester. He subsequently studied at Heidelberg and on his return was admitted to the bar. Mr. Fassett was appointed district attorney of Chemung county and at once entered the field of politics. He was elected to the Senate for the term of 1884-5 from the 27th District and has been thrice re-elected, serving as President pro tem of the Senate in his last term. Upon the resignation of Joel B. Erhardt he was appointed collector of the Port of New York, a position Mr. Fassett still holds.

A FATAL MISTAKE.

Physicians make no more fatal mistake than when they inform patients that nervous heart troubles come from the stomach and are of little consequence. Dr.
Franklin Miles, the noted Indiana specialist, has proven the contrary in his new book on "Heart Disease," which may be had free at Wm. T. Lee's drugstore, who guarantees and recommends Dr. Miles' unequalled New Heart Cure, which has the largest sale of any heart remedy in the world. It cures nervous and organic heart disease, short breath, fluttering, pain or tenderness in the side, arm or shoulder, irregular pulse, fainting, smothering, drowsy, etc. His Restorative Nervine cures headache, fits, etc.

Japan Will Be At The Fair.

The attitude of the Japanese Government towards the World's Columbian Exposition is indicated by the following communication to the House from Mr.
Mustu, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce:

"I have much pleasure in announcing the concurrence of the government with the motion passed by a large majority of the house—namely, the motion by Messrs. Nakamura Yaroku and Naito Rihachi, requesting the government to lay before the house a supplementary budget to provide funds for taking part in the international exhibition, which is to be held in Chicago on the 1st of May, 1893. You are doubtless aware that the exhibition is to be in commenoration of the great discovery made by Columbus, the discovery of America, the year of holding the exhibition being the forth centenary of the famous discovery. The United States government has moved all members of the comity of nations to contribute to the exhibition. It will certainly be one of the greatest affairs of its kind ever organized, and for that reason as well as in consideration of the fact that the intercourse between the United States and our country stands on a footing of special amity, and that America, as you are aware, offers the largest market for our products, the government has been preparing to take its place as a contributor immediately receipt of an official notice from the authorities of the United States.

"I need scarcely tell you that an exhibition is not purely a commercial affair, nor does direct commercial profit constitute its chief object. It aims rather at advertising the productions of a nation and introducing them to the knowledge of the world. It is, in fact, an opportunity to display a country's manufactures and products before the people of all lands, and to invite their judgement for the ultimate purpose of encouraging industry at home and opening new markets for the country's staples.

"In addition to these general considerations relating to exhibitions our special relations with the United States constitute a still stronger reason for contributing to the Chicago affair. I would invite your attention to the fact that the greater part of our products are now absorbed by America, and that, consequently, in the opinion of the government, the present is a rare opportunity for increasing the country's reputation and developing its avenues of profit."

It is certain that Japan will come to Chicago with an extensive exhibit.
Half a million dollars is the lowest sum mentioned as an appropriation. Trade between the United States and Japan aggregates more than $2,000,000 a month, or $25,000,000 a year. Our chief imports from Japan are silks, tea, rice and camphor. Kerosene oil is the principal article Japan imports from this country.

Mr. Platt's Leadership.

In the last Republican Convention which met at Rochester, fourteen years ago, Mr. Platt was Mr. Conkling's lieutenant. In the Rochester Convention of this year Mr. Platt has taken Mr. Conkling's place, and is as absolutely the party leader. Mr. Conkling's domination was imperious and intolerant, but he had qualities which made many men proud of his leadership is any Republican proud of Mr. Platt's leadership? Can any man be proud of a party which accepts his leadership?
How supreme it is shown by the fact that the Republican candidate for the Governorship was not indicated by any expressed opinion in the party, but by Mr. Platt, and it is undeniable that no candidate to whose nomination he was opposed would have been selected.
The nomination of a man like Andrew
D. White, who is a distinct personality, who would be his own master, and whose fidelity to political honesty and reom is familiar, might have been permitted by Mr. Platt for reasons that we have heretofore mentioned, but not if he had adicated success. Mr.
White's nomination, however, was highly improbable at any time, and there was no surprise when Mr. Platt's Collector of the Port of New York was selected as the Republican candidate.
To many Republicans it must be now painfully and suggestively evident that no man of Mr. White's character is any longer a natural and representative of the party.—Harper's Weekly

Patrick Egan in Chili.

When a civil war began in Chili it was the duty of our Minister to comprehend it, and while his official relations were with the existing government, his conduct should have been absolutely impartial, and his reports to his own government should have kept it precisely informed not only of facts, but of what he believed to be the probabilities of the situation.
Without such information foreign governments may be made practically hostile to movements which are really those of a people against lawless oppression. It is plain that Mr. Egan either did not understand the situation in Chili, or, for some reason, that he misrepresented it. He was believed by the Congressional leaders to be peculiarly friendly to Balmaceda and hostile to them, and they were in a position to know. Certainly our government had no accurate impression of the strength and prospects of the Congressional party, which in a single battle overthrew the Balmaceda dictatorship, drove him from the country, and ended all resistance to its power. The event showed that the statements of the accredited Congressional agents in this country were substantially correct, and our government should have been informed of that fact by a Minister fit for his trust. Mr. Egan's Balmacedan partiality was so pronounced that the Congressional party even believed that he had pecuniary interests with the Dictator, an allegation which he denies.

But his undeniable attitude gave the impression that the United States were unfriendly to the Congressional movement, so that the moral influence of of our name and sympathy was thrown against the side to which our sympathy would naturally incline. In view of this discouragement, the feeling of the people of Chili, who have overthrown the Dictator, is far from friendly to the United States. This is due to the appointment of a Minister not because of his fitness for a delicate and difficult duty, as the representative of this country in such an emergency in another country must necessarily be, but for what seems to be the pettiest and poorest politics.—Harper's Weekly.

Murdered.

The body of Julius Baer was found by freighters five miles west of here Tuesday morn, in a terribly mangled condition. His head and face were smashed so as to be hardly recognized, and numerous wounds were found on his body.
Mr. Baer was agent for the great blood medicine, Sulphur Bitters. Robbery was undoubtedly the motive, as he was well known to have a large sum of money on his person. As we go to press there is no clew to the perpetrators.—Colorado

No Car Tracks in London.

There are no street cars run by the trolley, storage or any other electric system; no cable cars, no horse cars; not a track laid for a surface road in the city proper. Many Americans leave London without ever seeing a street car of any kind, and yet in the metropolis 1,000 street cars run daily over 120 miles of track, but they are not permitted in crowded thoroughfares; they are confined to the outlying districts.

I have only seen them in the East End. The street cars are "double deck-ers," and, like the buses, they carry more outside than inside passengers, but the number of passengers is limited.
When the car has reached its limit it will take up no more passengers.
Every passenger has the right to a seat, and, to use a paradoxical phrase, every Englishman stands up for his right to a seat.

Street cars are not needed in the city.
Nearly all London streets are in as good condition for driving as our Central park roads. There are 8,000 hansom, 4,000 four wheelers and 2,000 omnibuses, so that you are not obliged to walk on account of the absence of cars. The four wheeled cabs or "growlers," as they term them, are dilapidated, uncomfortable vehicles, which lack new springs and are dirty
both inside and out.

The horses and the drivers are old and superannuated; they have all seen better days in private carriages or hansom cabs. You never take a four wheeler if you are alone, or if the party consists of only two persons. You must engage one if you have a trunk, but if you are going to catch a train or boat you had better allow a half hour's margin.

The London cab service is the best and cheapest in the world. The writer says this, notwithstanding that he remembers that you can hire a cab in Key West for a dime. But such cabs and such horses! The fare in a hansom for a two mile drive is one shilling (twenty-five cents); by the hour, two and six (sixty-two cents).
There are no such smart horses for public hire anywhere as the London cab horses. They go like the wind if by the course, and they go at a similar gait by the hour if you promise an extra sixpence.—New York Home Journal.

It is largely due to our always holding the lead in dress stuffs that our store now stands where it does.

Realizing this fact, recognizing the importance of always keeping this department at the top, we are continually on the alert to catch the first warning breath of fashion's intents, to watch without respite the markets of the world, getting quickly what Essex county people want, with always an eye to the intrinsic as well as the artistic value of every piece of cloth that comes into the store.

ESSEX COUNTY.

The veteran Salem Light Infantry have determined to hold their parade some time next month.

Dr. George B. Loring died without making a will.

James Connelley, a currier residing at 16 Federal street, Salem, was thrown from a Naumkeag car as it rounded the curve near Goodhue street, on Boston street, Saturday night, and his hip was fractured.

The police ambulance went to Boxford on Sunday and brought George Henderson, a little fellow 7 years of age to the Salem Hospital. George went from the Children's Home, three months ago to board in Boxford. In some manner he fell under a lumber wagon on Saturday, and the wheel passed over his left leg, breaking the thigh.

It is feared that the schooner Albert Woodbury, commanded by Frank B. Wallace, of Beverly, which sailed from Liverpool, N. S., on the 3rd inst., for Grand Banks, was lost in the gale of the 7th.

Mrs. Laura Gray, housekeeper for Mr. Wm. Davis on Fayette street, Beverly, made a misstep, one day last week, injuring her knee so badly as to make it necessary for her to be taken to the hospital.

Two young misses were passing through a piece of wood at Rialsde, Beverly, one day last week when they were accosted by a strange man, who, on learning the girls were Baptists, seized one of them and, saying he would show her "how they baptize," turned her head downward. They succeeded in escaping without harm. He was probably a crank.

Merit Wins.

We desire to say to our citizens that for years we have been selling Dr. King's New Discovery for Consumption, Dr. King's New Life Pills, Bucklen's Arnica Salve and Electric Bitters, and have never handled remedies that sell as well, or that have given such universal satisfaction. We do not hesitate to guarantee them every time, and we stand ready to refund the purchase price, if satisfactory results do not follow their use. These remedies have won their great popularity purely on their merits. Wm. T. Lee.

"After mature deliberation, I have decided to take this step," remarked the Boston babe, putting out its foot in a first attempt to walk.

When the baby cries every one wants to know what's the matter; and if the outcry is frequent, the chances are that there is something wrong about the food. It requires unusual facilities to be able to keep posted on all the latest ideas about feeding young children, therefore the article "How and What to Feed the Baby," published in the October number of that progressive monthly Demorest's Family Magazine, is especially valuable to all who have anything to do with babies. It will tell you everything you need to know about baby's food from the time it is born till it can eat the regular meals of the family,—what food to give, how to prepare each kind, how much and how often the child should be fed, when and how often the diet should be changed, with bill of fare for different ages, etc.,—and all so clearly that one cannot misunderstand the directions. Ella Wilcox's story, "Was It Suicide?" should be read by every woman, and all will enjoy the "Confession of a Material-Medium;" "In the Woman Ward of an Insane Asylum" tells a pathetic story of its own; "Fireside Nooks and Corners" gives valuable suggestions about inexpensive but artistic house decoration, all the numerous departments are replete with valuable matter; there are nearly 200 fine illustrations; and altogether it is a remarkably fine number of this comprehensive magazine, which is published for $2 a year by W. Jennings Demorest, 15 East 14th St., New York City.

The second instalment of "Dickens' Letters to Wilkie Collins" will appear in the October number of Harper's Magazine.

John Hay will contribute a poem to Harper's Magazine for October.

Harper's Magazine for October will contain short stories by Richard Harding Davis and Hildegard Hawthorne, a granddaughter of Nathaniel Hawthorne.

The city of Cario to many Americans is only a confused memory of donkeys and dragomans, mosquitoes, dervishes and mosques. It is revealed only to those who stay there long after the first impressions are worn away, or who return. It must be seen with the actual eyes, and without haste. This is why so many descriptions of the Egyptian capital have failed to give any adequate idea of its true character—its people, its climate, its peculiar attractiveness. The traveller who arrives and leaves according to a fixed programme is not likely to carry away with him such pleasant impressions of the place as those recorded by Constance Fenimore Woolson in a remarkably entertaining paper on "Cario in 1890," which she has prepared for the October number of Harper's Magazine. This paper, which will be very fully illustrated, is perhaps the most complete, most interesting, and most impartial description of modern Cario yet written.

A portrait of Mark Twain, from a recent photograph, will occupy the front page of the next number of Harper's Weekly, published September 28th. Among other leading attractions in the number will be an illustrated paper on "Cricket in America," which will be full of interest not only to amateurs and professionals, but to the general reader.

A true story of the great pianist Gottschalk, by E. H. House, will be one of the attractive features in Harper's Young People for September 23d. The same number will contain a charming illustrated poem, "Chicks beside the Sea," by Margaret E. Sangster; an article on "Shooting Porpoises" on the Florida coast; and the unusual rich variety of stories, sketches, short articles and poems.

"Two Lunatics" is the title of a bright and breezy parlor farce, especially adapted to the use of amateurs, which Katharine Loring Van Cott will contribute to next week's number of Harper's Bazar. Antoinette Van Hoosen has written for the same number an interesting and valuable paper on "Woman's Work in the Columbian Exposition."

Attention! Everybody!!

Do you love a cool and refreshing drink of Soda or Moxie? If you do, call for one of Stevens' Best. We can furnish you six days in the week, but on the seventh you will have to go dry. We have at our store all of the stations of both electric and horse cars running in and out of Peabody; but on the seventh day, or Sunday, you will be obliged to stand out of door in the heat or the rain as the case might be, as we have had a notice served on us by the so-called Law and Order League of Peabody, denying us the right to sell Soda, Confectionery, Cigars or Tobacco on that day. Therefore, we were obliged to close as we could not furnish, could not keep open.

COD BLESS PEABODY!!

She needs it! 10,000 inhabitants and not a hotel or public house in the place! No inducements for strangers to visit us! No wonder our business is dull! No wonder our factories lay idle, our tanneries shut up and all business at a standstill! What we want is liberal sentiment and not littleness of mind! Then we shall grow and prosper as other Towns round about us.

Don't think we are losing courage at this state of affairs. We hope to see them righted and to live to see the good old Town once more redeemed and made prosperous as in the days gone by.

We have a large and fine stock of goods in our store, and we shall try to sell you as cheap as elsewhere. All fruits in their season. Choice Cigars, Confectionery, Tobacco and a thousand things too numerous to mention.

Will try to give you a lunch as well as we know how.

TREMONT THEATRE.

On Monday night next, September 28, the Comedian, Stuart Robson, will come to the Tremont Theatre and will find the like welcome to that he has always received in Boston heartily awaiting him,—the welcome to a friend and artist, and a gentleman personally held in high esteem. Mr. Robson will inaugurate his engagement with a revival, in what he modestly terms, an "adequate manner" of Goldsmith's immortal comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer." Despite the fact that this city is probably more familiar than any other in the country with this play, and holds a correspondingly great liking for it, next week's production is to be on a scale of magnificence and historical correctness, as regards costumes and scenic embellishments, never before attempted. Of all the old English plays this is probably the most perfect specimen of what real comedy should be. At the very first sentence the stream of humor begins to flow. Mrs. Hardcastle's expostulation against being kept in the country, and her husband's grumbling defence; the alehouse and the contrast to the genteel travelers misdirected; the drilling of the servants by Hardcastle; the matchless scene between Marlowe, his friend, and the supposed landlord; the interrupted story of the Duke of Marlborough, unrivaled in any comedy; the scene between the shy Marlowe and Miss Hardcastle. And then the exquisite episode of young Marlowe and the supposed barmaid, gracious in thought and unequalled in wit and humor, and a score of other situations unrivaled in the art of the English-speaking stage.

It will be a deep pleasure to all lovers of the "legitimate" to again see this glorious work, and it is a rare laurel in the wreath of Mr. Robson's honor that he affords us the opportunity. Mr. Robson will himself be seen in the role in which he should be superlatively excellent, that of Tony Lumpkin, the graceless scamp who makes a victim of every one, his vain, fussy mother included. The company has been especially organized for this revival, and the most famous scenic artists have painted the scenery. The costumes, also, will be absolutely accurate reproductions from old plates. The original epilogue, slighted by modern managers, and not spoken from the stage since the first production of the comedy at Covent Garden Theatre, London, 1773, will be delivered in this production by Miss Waldron, Miss Busby, and Mr. Robson. "Is Marriage a Failure?" and "The Henrietta," are also in preparation for this engagement.

BOSTON THEATRE.

Denman Thompson's name has become a household word through New England, and thousands who never attend a theatre on ordinary occasions, from religious or other reasons, are flocking to the Boston Theatre to see him in the "Old Homestead."

Wm. H. Crane plays his farewell engagement in the role of "The Senator" at the Hollis Street Theatre to-day. Monday Rose Coglian in "Dorothy's Dilemma" will be the attraction. Seats commenced selling Thursday and are being rapidly taken.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE.

"Kidnapped" will be presented to-night for the last time. Monday "Natural Gas" will be put upon the boards. This farce has had such abounding success upon the road and is so familiar to most of our readers by reputation as to call for no comment.

A "Texas Steer" will be played for the last time at the Tremont to-night.

"A Hole in the Ground" will have a run at the Howard next week.

A large house saw the performance of "The Devil's Editor," a farce-comedy that brings out the humor of a country editor's life, at the Park Theatre last night. The first act was nearly over before the audience "caught on," but after this point the efforts of the performers were rewarded with almost continuous laughter. The business that caught the house was of the vandeville order, and the cast numbers several people who have made their mark in this line. Sheridan and Flynn, Miss Alice Harrison, Frank Doane and Thomas J. Grady shared the honors about equally. There were songs, dances and many sayings that went with much gusto.—Philadelphia Record.

ELECTRIC ILLUMINATION.

The Town Appropriates $50,000, at the Special Meeting for the Purpose.

At the special town meeting called to hear and act upon the report of the Electric Light Committee on Tuesday evening, Cyrus T. Batchelder was chosen moderator.

The committee submitted the following report:

GENTLEMEN:—Your committee chosen to investigate and report the cost of erecting and maintaining an electric light plant for the purpose of lighting the streets and public buildings of the town, would respectfully submit the following report. While we would recommend the town to build an electric light plant and install the 1200 candle power arc light system for the purpose of lighting the streets of the town and for commercial purposes, we would also recommend that the subject of lighting the public buildings be referred back to the committee that they may endeavor to find out the wants for private use for incandescent lighting, and that the committee make its report on installing the incandescent system at a subsequent meeting.

We have secured a location for the station on land owned by Mr. Stephen Blaney on Endicott, corner of Warren streets. This location the committee selected before making its report in August, 1890. We were unable to secure the land at that time as Mr. Blaney was not willing to sell for this purpose. You can now buy the land at a reasonable price, and with it secure water and railroad privileges that will be of great value as the demands upon the station increase. While the Edison General Electric company still hold the town to the contract made in August, 1890, they are disposed to put in the most improved electrical apparatus and to the satisfaction of your committee. And we are still of the opinion after recent investigation, their system is the best we have been able to find. The amount we shall recommend to be appropriated, though larger than that appropriated in August, is no larger in proportion to what the town receives.

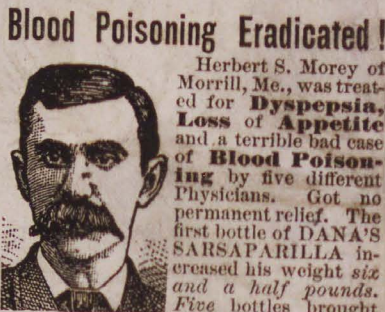

We have employed a competent engineer and architect who has prepared plans and specifications, upon which estimates have been received. The land has been examined for foundations. The committee have no bill of expense except for the above labor, for this purpose they have expended $89.90. There being no money appropriated for the use of the committee, we would recommend that the sum of $89.90 be appropriated to cover this expense of the committee. The plan proposed is for a brick station with slated roof, the station to be large enough to run 500 horse power capacity, one slow speed engine, two boilers, pump, heater, shafting etc., etc., the whole to be put up in a substantial manner. The capacity of the engines and boilers will be greater than called for to run the dynamos contracted for. The dynamos, four in number, will have a capacity of 1801200 nominal candle power arc lights.

It is proposed to light the streets of the town generally within the following boundaries: Lynn line on Lynn street, Lynnfield St. to Craig's mill, Lowell to Proctor's Crossing, Andover to Pike & Whipple's, Liberty to Gardner, Northend to Holly, Tremont, Main, and Aborn to the Salem line. The above is what the contract with the Edison General Electric company calls for. We would, however, recommend the extension on Cross, Sutton and some six hundred feet on Gardner and Lynnfield streets. We have planned to so light the streets that there can be but little, if any additional light asked for within the territory named. To do this will require about 120 lights. The cost to maintain 1201200 candle power arc lights allowing 2 per cent. for depreciation and 4 per cent. for interest, we estimate will be $75 per light per year, the lights to burn all night every night in the year except at the period of full moon.

You are now paying the Salem Electric Light company $182.50 for each of the 2000 candle power lights furnished the town. The city of Salem is paying $164.25 per year for the same light. Were you able to obtain the light from the Salem Company at $150 per light per year, the saving by owning your own plant would be enough to pay the cost of lighting the town as proposed.

You will notice we are comparing the cost of the 1200 candle power light to that of the 2000 candle light. We have recently visited Salem and Beverly, the former being lighted by 2000 candle power light the latter by the 1200 candle power light, the difference in the amount of light furnished we failed to see. One of the officials of the Beverly Company informing members of your committee, that many had remarked that their 1200 candle power light was as brilliant as the Salem 2000 candle power light.

Our price has always been $5.00 without deviation; and for two years we have done no club work.
We shall probably never sell clubs again, their day having gone by, but there are many who do not care during these dull times to pay so much as $4.00 a dozen for pictures, but who still want the best. As we wish to reach this class, but do not believe in charging two prices for the same thing, we have decided to adopt the medium price of $4.00 for a short time. The quality of work will be the same as heretofore.

Having lighted the streets as proposed the Dynamos still have a capacity of about 60—2000 candle power lights that may be sold. We would recommend that the sum of forty seven thousand dollars be appropriated for the purpose of establishing an Electric Light Plant that a committee of five be chosen with full power, that the town authorize them to buy land, set poles and string wires in the streets, to take stone and material for grading from the gravel pit owned by the town, and do all other acts necessary to be done. That the town treasurer be authorized with the approval of the selectmen, to hire for this purpose the sum of forty seven thousand dollars ($47,000.) in such manner and on such terms as they deem best for the town. That the sum of $3000 be appropriated for this plant to light the streets, and furnish commercial arc lighting until the annual appropriations are made in March.

(Signed) HERBERT P. REED,
NICHOLAS M. QUINT,
CHARLES C. DODGE,
ALBERT E. SOUTHWICK,
CHARLES B. HAVEN.

Alexander B. Merrill moved that the report be accepted, and further action upon the same postponed until the annual town meeting in March. This motion was the prelude to a protracted discussion, the opponents of the scheme urging delay, while the committee pressed for immediate action.

Messrs Alexander B. Merrill, C. Warren Osborn, Jonathan King and Rufus H. Brown favored delay and spoke generally against the whole scheme, as an unwarrantable expense. Stephen Blaney, C. C. Dodge, D. J. Sweeney and H. P. Reed spoke in favor of the adoption of the recommendations of the committee.

The acceptance of the recommendation was opposed particularly upon the ground of the great increase of cost of installation over what was reported last year, $17,000 being added to the estimate, without any provision for incandescent lights which must surely come and add several thousands more to the cost.

When the vote was taken the question was divided and it was first voted to accept the report of the committee. The question of postponement was then submitted and lost. Upon motion of D. J. Sweeney the report of the committee was adopted. The vote standing 225 in the affirmative and 10 in the negative 200 to 300 not voting. The total appropriation was $50,089.90.

The article relating to repeal of the town By-laws relating to incarceration of truants at the Alms house was taken up and on motion the by-law was quickly repealed, the establishment of a county school at Lawrence rendering that law useless.

Killed on the Rail.
Saturday night the body of a young man was found in a mangled condition, on the railroad between Lynn and Swampscott. From a card in the pocket it was supposed that the remains were those of a young man named Clark, a student at Andover. On Tuesday afternoon, however, Mrs. Butler who resides on Fulton street, accompanied by her daughter, visited the Lynn morgue and identified the body as that of her son Joseph E. Butler, and on Wednesday Undertaker Fallon removed it to this town.

Young Butler was a morocco dresser by trade and was 21 years of age.

Last Saturday afternoon he left home about 4 o'clock and as he did not return, and the attention of his mother being called to the description of the victim of the Saturday night accident, she deemed it best to visit Lynn and assure herself. Although the train had mangled the body beyond recognition, she had little difficulty in satisfying herself of the identity by the clothing.

Nothing definite is known of the cause of the fatality, but it is conjectured that he may have fallen off a train, and being rendered insensible by the concussion, lay there until another train came along and ran over him.

Mr. Clark, the Andover student, on being informed of the supposition that he was the victim, expressed some surprise, but said that he could account for his card being in the pocket of Butler, as he had given away quite a large number Saturday afternoon.

Fire at the Pottery.

An alarm of fire was rung in this morning from box 13, caused by a conflagration at the pottery building in which the kiln is located rear of Central street. The fire is supposed to have caught from the kiln although the fires were put out at 4.30 yesterday afternoon. The building was completely destroyed inside and the loss is estimated at $2000. Mr. M. P. Paige the proprietor was protected by insurance issued from the office of O. B. Chadwick & Co., to the amount of $1000.

The whistle on the pumping station failed to sound the alarm, as it has on previous occasions, although the Boston firm that undertook to remedy the defect had pronounced it all right when they left it. It is thought that dust from the furnaces find its way into the electrical mechanism and interrupts its operation at times. The matter will be investigated and if possible permanently remedied.

See What Is In Dixie.

The people of the Southern section of the Union have gathered together the products of the farm, orchard and garden, and placed them on exhibition in Raleigh, the capital of North Carolina. By reason of its proximity to the Northern cities, this is a most convenient point at which to hold the Southern Interstate Exposition. The rate for the round trip from New York by way of the Old Dominion Steamers will be about fifteen dollars; from Baltimore by the Bay Line Steamers on the beautiful Chesapeake Bay, about ten dollars; from Norfolk, Va. about four dollars; from Washington, D. C., by way of the Atlantic Coast Line of the Richmond & Danville, about ten dollars.

This is the most excellent opportunity that will be presented to the Northern people to see what is and can be grown in our Southern States; and by all means let our people go down and see what the South can show; see the people, get acquainted with them, and learn much that will be to their advantage. The mode of growing cotton, distilling turpentine, the picking of cotton and pressing it into bales are all interesting features in Southern industry. The exhibition will be so unlike the Chicago Exposition, so unlike any thing North or West, that our people will miss the opportunity of their lives if they fail to attend the great exposition during the months of October and November.

Inquire of H. P. Clark, 229 Broadway, New York; or at Bay Line Steamers' wharf, Baltimore, for reduced rate tickets.

Mrs. George S. Brimmer had a night blooming cereus blossom on Sunday evening at her residence on Elm street.

The funeral of Patrick F. Clancy last Sunday was largely attended and when the funeral train started, about five hundred men were in line followed by fifteen carriages. The St. John's C. T. A. The Carl Pierce Concert.
The musical entertainment given in the Opera House on Wednesday evening by the Carl Pierce Concert Company under the auspices of Abbott Council O. U. A. M. was a fitting opening of the entertainment season, and was highly appreciated by all lovers of fine music. The performances of Master Carl Pierce upon the violin were wonderful interpretations. We would not do him justice to say simply—wonderful for one of his years. He has far out-run his years in the progress of his accomplishments. The other numbers were filled to the entire satisfaction of the large audience, no criticism being heard except from a few, that the class of music performed by the company was of too high order. Some simple familiar airs though revolting to the aesthetic ear would have pleased some of the audience, if they had been worked in an encores.

The St. John's C. T. A. Society will attend the Haverhill parade a week from Monday accompanied by the Beverly Drum Corps. Before taking the train, they will march to the line, and meet the Salem delegations which they will escort to the Peabody station.

Pot Pie Dumplings

ORIGINAL. No. 43.
BY MRS. DEARBORN,
Principal Boston Cooking School.
Mix and sift together 1 pint pastry flour, 1 heaping tea sp. Cleveland's Baking Powder and 1/2 tea sp. salt. Beat 1 egg until thick and light, add 1/2 cup cold water, stir this into the dry mixture, and enough more water to make a dough stiff enough to hold its shape when dropped from the spoon.

Drop the dumplings on a plate a little distance apart and cook in a closely covered steamer for fifteen minutes; or, drop them on top of the boiling stew and cook for the same length of time.
The secret of having them light and tender lies in their not being disturbed while cooking, and in not having much liquid around them, if cooked on top of the stew.—(Copyright, 1891, by Cleveland Baking Powder Co.)
Use only Cleveland's baking powder, the proportions are made for that.

Hannah Fearing's Fortune.

By AUGUSTA LARNED

[Copyright, 1891, by American Press Association.]

CHAPTER I.

"I don't believe in doin' that kind of thing for folks," said he.

"I must say, Hannah, I think you're going agin your own interest in keeping that old man; there isn't any call that I can see. He ain't your kith nor kin—no kind of a blood relation. You're not morally obligated, and I wouldn't think of keeping him."

The speaker was a tall, thin man, whose homespun clothes hung loosely on his badly jointed frame. His lean face was hollow and freckled, and his pale blue eyes were as cold as a frozen pond in January. He raked his sharp chin, stubbled with a rough red growth, with his long, meager, yellow hand. Although he was still a comparatively young man, he stooped like an old one, and his shoulders were contracted almost to the point of deformity.

"I know you wouldn't think of keeping him, Joel," said the woman addressed as Hannah, a trim, small, bright-eyed person, with humorous lines running away from the corners of her mouth and a dark, thin face furrowed with care and trouble and much hard labor. "The age of miracles is over, so folks say," and she broke into a sarcastic laugh that showed several deficiencies in her naturally good set of teeth.

She was standing by Joel's wagon with her apron thrown over her head, for the early spring was still shrewish, and a pitcher in her hand. Joel, who was her brother-in-law, peddled milk through the town, though he was a rich farmer and there was no occasion for his following a humble calling. Mrs. Fearing paid Joel the highest market price for her daily supply. He had never given her a drop of the fluid except on one occasion, in very warm weather, when the milk had soured on his hands in a thunder storm and he did not care to carry it home. Now he gave her a venomous glance from under his heavy red eyelids, puckered and folded in curious fashion and denuded of lashes; neither had he any visible eyebrows, which imparted to his cold eyes a curious dazed stare.

"I don't believe in doin' that kind of thing for folks," said he, after a moment's pause. "It generally hurts 'em. Taint the kind of thing that's needed to spur 'em up and make 'em do for themselves."

"No danger of your ever hurting folks that away," said Hannah with another biting laugh. "Your callin' and election's sure so far as that goes, Joel. I guess you'd have helped me and the children some when we was left so poorly off if it hadn't been for your principles; and you see, Joel, what a splendid success we've made of keeping ourselves. I know you're a man who wouldn't put your hand in your pocket for nothing in this world if you thought it was going to make people lazy and shiftless."

Joel turned a pale sea green color and set his thin lips together in a straight line. His sister-in-law knew the sensitive, exposed places in his armor and was skillful in shooting her bitter arrows. He turned uneasily and shuffled away toward his milk cart, but Hannah was close behind him like a visible Nemesis in a faded brown calico gown. It was a great relief to her overwrought nerves to unburden her mind to Joel Fearing.

"You know," she went on, as she followed him toward the cart, raising her voice a little, "that was what ailed your brother Anson; he was too generous and open handed and he went against his own interests, and you always condemned Anson and thought so poorly of him it would have been a sin for you to help his widow in her straits, you know it would. And after poor Anson died you brought in a bill against him for borrowed money that most covered all his interest in the undivided half of his father's homestead, and you made me sign a quitclaim to the property though I felt sure that debt had been paid, and you came into possession of the whole of that nice old farm, with all the stock and farm implements and the woodlots on the Dewsville road, and there was only bare enough left of Anson's share to pay his funeral expenses."

She stopped suddenly, as if something was choking her. Joel took advantage of the pause in the torrent of her passionate speech to climb awkwardly into his wagon, and from that safe vantage he was enabled to fire a parting shot at the enemy.

"I don't wonder Anson died young," said he in his slow way, "for don't Scriptur say it's better to have smoke in the eyes than to live in a house with a brawling woman?" He gave his old horse a smart smack with the whip that made him leap in ungainly, rheumatic fashion, and Hannah turned quickly and entered her house, standing for a moment by the open door with the apron still thrown over her head, while her throat seemed torn by hard, dry sobs. Not a patient woman was Hannah Fearing, and strong, too, in all her feelings—a good hater and an ardent lover. Her husband's people called her proud, and Joel said she was obstinate and self-willed and as vicious as his old brindle cow. But Joel was known to be a notorious falsifier, so that his opinion did not count for much in Littlefield. Joel naturally abhorred that type of woman and had chosen for his helpmeet one of the meek and colorless ones of the earth.

Hannah was standing in her spotless little kitchen, where the range fire blazed fiercely, for it was ironing day and a great pile of folded clothes lay in the basket and the table stood ready with its snowy ironing cloth. The things must be done up and carried home before dark, for Judge Bright's new shirts were in demand for his journey to Washington and Mrs. Price needed her baby things—wonderful caps and bibs and frocks and slippers. It was Mrs. Price's first, and, as everybody knows, the first always gets more ruffles and frills and puffs and fine embroidery than those that come later.

But Hannah let her irons get overheated as she stood there with the dry sobs suddenly shaking her breast and her brown, sinewy hand clinched on the edge of the table. All the past had come rolling upon her like a torrent, and it would have way, for in a nature like Hannah's there are crises like sudden thunder showers that clear the air, and when they had passed the bright sun shone, the heavens were blue overhead, and she put forth those great strokes of work for which she was famous among her neighbors. Every muscle was tense and strung to the utmost, and her skirts sounded like the breezes in a sail as she passed back and forth from the stove to the ironing table, and laid out the dainty white things on the clothes frames smelling of new grass and sweet like the breath of country clover.

But an encounter with Joel generally did stir up the bitter waters in Hannah's soul. It took her back to the time after Anson's death when her brother-in-law put in his heavy claim for debt and she had signed away her rights, though she felt morally sure the claim had been paid, but with her confused head and all the dull, stupid grief that weighed upon her from the suddenness of the blow, she could never clearly remember what Anson had told her about the note, and the acknowledgment of payment and all his other papers had strangely disappeared. She had lain awake nights trying in vain to catch up the floating threads of memory, and it was in her dazed, hopeless state that she had signed a release to her claim on the old farm. Then the anguish all came back of the time when she first knew that her little home in Littlefield was mortgaged up to its full value and must be sold on a foreclosure sale, and she and her two children would be turned into the street. She had humbled herself and gone on her knees to Joel, but he had refused to help her.

He had called Anson improvident and careless about his affairs, and said he had no ready money to throw after that which his brother had already squandered. He had had dealings with Anson and had not come out unscathed in his transactions with his brother, so he said, as he looked on his sister-in-law's distress with cold, unsympathetic eye. She was the kind of a woman he hated, and partly, too, he feared her, for the sharpness of her sarcasm could always put to flight his wits and make him play a sorry part. So he buttoned his long pockets and determined, as he profanely said, to let Providence take its course. If his sister-in-law came to eat grass, after the manner of a wicked king of old, would it not be a just punishment for her pride and stubborn independence of character, her putting away of good counsel and refusal to look up to those better and wiser than herself?

But poor Hannah was not brought down to eat the grass of the field as a special warning to an obdurate and stiff-necked generation. It happened in that terribly cold week after her husband's funeral, when she sat dumb and stricken with her children gathered close under her wing by the scant fire in her kitchen stove, that help had come, heaven sent, as Hannah ever after believed, for she, too, was religious, but in a different way from Joel. Anson's friend and employer, Hiram Rand, in whose mill he had been foreman for many years, had paid off the mortgage on her house and had brought it to her as a free gift in his simple, mild fashion, as if it were an everyday occurrence and worthy of no special thanks. Mr. Rand was a quiet man, never known to get excited about anything except rare old books, of which he was very fond and possessed a precious store.

But he had his own unpretentious ways of finding out the needs of others and of doing good, and after Fearing's sudden death he had inquired carefully into the widow's circumstances, and the result of the inquiry was that he had, without saying a word to any one, gone and paid off the mortgage on the widow's little home and practically made her a present of $2,500. When Hannah tried in vain to express her thanks and her conception of the magnitude of the present she had received, he begged her not to excite herself. Mr. Rand hated to be the cause of excitement in anybody unless it broke out over some rare old black letter volume. He intimated that in his judgment Anson had earned the sum over and above the salary he had received in his service, and he was only paying a just debt. Then he took up his hat and went out, closing the door softly behind him. He was a man of few words except on his own particular hobbies, and on them he would talk endlessly.

Now Hannah, the moment Mr. Rand left the house, dropped on her knees on the kitchen floor, and with the tears streaming from her eyes uttered such a prayer of praise and thanksgiving to God her children could never forget it to their dying day. From that moment everything was changed. The name of Hiram Rand became a sacred name in that humble little home. She taught her children to reverence and look up to it as to a guiding star. Her home secure, Hannah drank at once from deep wells of strength and inspiration. She felt equal to strenuous labor to rear and educate her children. The ambition of noble mothers stirred in her to give them the instruction she had never received in her poor neglected childhood. She lived by sewing and taking in washing and it was nothing to Hannah to rise at four and to go to bed at midnight that her children might be kept at school.

But strange unlooked for changes have occurred within the eight years since Anson died. Hiram Rand, who was then the richest man in Littlefield, having inherited a fine fortune from an uncle and a flourishing business from his father, was now one of the poorest. Sometimes, with a quiet gleam of sad humor, he said to his friend Dr. Boskirk that he possessed nothing but what he had given away. While he sat quietly in his library gleaning over his Elzevirs and Aldines, noble first editions in precious bindings, his fortune, in the hands of an unscrupulous agent, melted away in ruinous speculations. His stocks and bonds were involved in the embarrassment of a great railway and the failure of a metropolitan bank, and his mill and real estate all passed out of his hands to meet the liabilities thus incurred.

Then, as misfortunes like rocks always fly in black flocks, his only daughter, a beautiful girl, died just in the bloom of young womanhood, and his son was drowned on a yachting excursion in the Mediterranean. The old man, thus wrecked in his affections and fortunes, fell into an illness, from which he arose after many weeks a broken and a disabled man, one side partially paralyzed and his left arm and hand quite useless. When he came to consciousness the auctioneers were in the lower rooms of his house knocking down the furniture to the lowest bidder, and Hannah Fearing was at his bedside, where she had faithfully held her post for six long weeks. The doctor had bid in a few of the precious old volumes from Rand's valuable library, and in less than a week after the sale the sick man and this little remnant of his fortunes, once great for a country town, were moved over to Hannah's best room, the parlor of the brown cottage where he had lived ever since on her care and bounty.

Hannah said she was paying a debt, and if she spent the remainder of her life in nursing Hiram Rand it would not make up to him what he had done for her. He was old, alone in the world without near relatives, poor and practically helpless, for he was nailed to his chair by paralysis and could only just manage to wheel himself from his bed to his reading table by the window. The quiet, unostentatious benefactions of the man had made him many friends, but principally among the poor, who could do nothing but pray for him in his afflictions. Hannah had kept him now for three years, giving him the care of a loving and devoted daughter. He had taken it in the right spirit, for, as he often said, it is a rarer virtue to receive with grace than to give from your abundance. A peculiar bond had grown up between them as she cooked and washed for him, or nursed his ailments and kept the sunny little parlor where he lived as neat as wax, replying to all narrow minded criticism of her behavior with biting, sarcastic speech.

It was with immense pride and affection that Hannah looked at the old man, whom she revered as a being of supernatural endowments. She was not a woman to do things by halves nor to stint her love and devotion. It was her belief that the old man had brought her good luck and a blessing, for had she not flourished uncommonly these three years past? Had not everybody been kind? Had not the world been made soft to her in many unexpected ways, and human love and appreciation been shown to her as they seldom were to her rich neighbors? But some of her hopes had miscarried. Do any of us bring all our little dream argosies into port? Sybil would never make a teacher. She had been forced to let her learn typewriting and take a place in Lawyer Dinsmore's office.

Sybil was now eighteen and not at all of her mother's temperament, not at all a driver with mighty power to turn off work, with tears and laughter lying close together in her fiery and impetuous soul; but round and soft and dreamy as callow birds in the west—the poetic young girl but half awake to the outer world and living in a realm of her own thoughts and fancies.

And Dick, too, had been taken from school and placed in the chemical works of the town. They were both earning a little, but it was a pang at Hannah's heart when she thought that Dick must be kept from his books. The boy had a real passion for mathematics, and nights after her labor, with a stocking to mend on her hand, the mother bent with her boy over his slate trying vainly to help him with the knotty problems.

Mr. Rand had no head for figures. He acknowledged it with sorrow. It was a singular defect in his constitution that had led to the wreck of his worldly affairs. As he said, he could not comprehend why two and two should invariably make four. But the old man had tried to form Dick's literary taste on the best models. He had recommended to him, as entertaining reading of the savoiest kind, Burton's "Melancholia," Sir Thomas Browne's "Essay on Burial Urns," Moore's "Utopia" and Isaac Walton's "Gentle Angler." The boy had come near breaking his mental teeth on these hard nuts, and had failed to crack any of them except Walton, who is meat for all ages.

Now we must go back to Hannah where she stood testing the hot iron close to her brown cheek, there in the little kitchen where the fresh clothes had begun to drift like snow banks in January, filling chairs, baskets and tables with their daintiness. In a handsome pile were Judge Rivers' Washington shirts, shining with elbow gloss and the high splendor of the iron. Hannah had paused for a moment to listen at the old man's door. The doctor was within, and she heard the two old fellows laughing together, and the sound warmed the cockles of her heart. Presently the doctor came into the kitchen and closed the door behind him. He was a very large man, the heaviest, it was said, in Littlefield, and puffy to a degree that when he tried to get through Hannah's small doors he Stomach—blood—poisons of every name and nature, by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It's a medicine that starts from the beginning. It rouses every organ into healthy action, purifies and enriches the blood, and through it cleanses and renews the whole system. All Blood, Skin, and Scalp Diseases, from a common blotch or eruption to the worst Scrofula, are cured by it. For Tetters, Salt-rheum, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Goitre or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands, Tumors, and Swellings, it's an unequalled remedy. Don't think it's like the sarsaparilla. They claim to be good for the blood in March, April, and May. "Golden Medical Discovery" works equally well at all seasons. And it not only cleanses to good effect, but cures it. If it doesn't benefit or cure, in every case, you have your money back. You pay only for the good you get. Can you ask more?

A Chinese Druggist.

A Chinese druggist will freely display the most nauseous and disgusting substances as medicine. Often he will keep a live deer there in a pen against the time when it will be pounded whole in a mortar, coram populo, to convince customers that his drugs are genuine. Medicines are gulped down by the quart, the prescriber holding that if one ingredient does not do its work another may. Their virtues nevertheless are many and mysterious.

A missionary doctor was well acquainted with a native practitioner, a man of considerable intelligence and repute. Him he brought to his home one day and showed, with natural pride, his three fair haired little girls. The native hastened to compliment his foreign friend, "Their complexions are indeed beautiful, but, if I may say so, their hair is perhaps hardly dark enough." He produced a bottle. "A dose of this taken internally three times a day would make a wonderful improvement."

He went on with more embarrassment. "There is another thing about them that I hardly like to mention." His friend reassured him. "Well, if you will allow me to say it, they are all girls. Now I have at home some pills that are perfectly infallible. Let them take these regularly for a month or so, and I promise they will develop into three as fine boys as father could wish for."—Temple Bar.

was obliged to turn edgewise. His tremendous nose of no particular shape, was matched by a great double chin and heavy hanging cheeks. But above rose one of the best and soundest of heads, a noble forehead, with an eye like an eagle's, piercing, dark, terrible or benignant. It saw straight through all shams and could shine in tears or laughter, or chastise with a whip of scorpions.

The doctor's head was immense above his great, generous ears, and his capacious, shabby hat was set far back upon it. His clothes were rusty and spotted with chemicals, and he carried about with him the odor of the drug shop, as doctors often do. His hands, strange to say, were small and fine, and seemed always involuntarily fingering a weak pulse. A sixth sense seemed to reside in those supersensitive hands. He came up to Hannah's ironing table, and a little furtive smile began to curl round her thin lips and light up her dark face, for she knew what was coming. The doctor had slipped a dollar greenback under the ironing stand.

"You know, Hannah," said he, in the wheedling, coaxing tone he used with nervous, fidgety, unreasonable patients. "I couldn't think of taking the old man's money. You must use the fee to buy him some little comforts. Why, Hannah, it's such a privilege to come in and talk a bit with the old man. I don't do it half as often as I would like to; it seems a dissipation, like the opium habit or gin drinking. You should have heard him today; he was immense—way up in the starchy spheres, and you would have thought that those old chaps who wrote his favorite books were right there in the room with him."

The doctor was talking against time, and Hannah, as she paused in her work, gave him a penetrating look. "I guess," said she slowly, "there are angels up there that smile, if they don't laugh right out, at some of the lies that's told down here. As if the old man had money to pay in fees. As if he had had a cent in his pocket since he came to me three years ago. We thought that maybe some of his distant rich kin might think to send him a Christmas present, but they never do. There's two things folks always keep clear of, doctor—poverty and pestilence."

"But it's to be remembered, Hannah," responded the doctor, "that the poor are always good to the poor. Without their kindness to each other the world would not go on. I've seen a good deal of human nature in my time, and I know it's awfully mean in spots, and in other spots it's lit up with heaven's own light—unexpected spots, too, mostly."

"Yes," said Hannah, softly setting down her iron. "When I think of you going round in the country in your old mud spattered shay, tending the tired farmers' wives, and the rheumatic old folks, and the sick babies, somehow I think of them lines in the Bible, 'The desert and the solitary place shall rejoice, and the wilderness shall blossom like the rose.'"

"Sho, Hannah," said the doctor, pushing back his hat still further on his great head, and looking warm and embarrassed. "Who'd ever thought you would drop into poetry? What am I or any of us compared with that old philosopher in there nailed to his chair, helpless and half dead, and with the light of happiness all around him. I tell you, Hannah, he's a daily lesson to me. By the way, have you heard that Joel has had an offer for his farm? A big offer too. A city man is coming here to set up a racing stable and to raise fine stock. He's taken a fancy to the old place, and it is thought Joel will get almost any price he may ask. You know that detached piece of fifty acres on the Dewberry road the old man left in wood land. Well, it's coming right into the market. The town is growing rapidly out in that direction, and Joel talks of cutting it up into building lots and selling it off at so much the foot. They do say the best part of the town is going out that way, and Joel will know how to make his profit."

"That wood lot would have been mine and the children's," cried Hannah suddenly, throwing up her hand with a passionate gesture, "if I hadn't signed away our rights, and now the wicked flourish like a green bay tree."

"Tut, tut," said the doctor, in a mild tone of rebuke. "Think of the old man in there who never utters a word of complaint against those who have wronged him."

"I know," said Hannah, suddenly humbled; "he's a saint, and he's brought a blessing to this house, but I am not a patient nature and sometimes when I get to thinking about the past I'm most mad."

The doctor looked for a moment silently into the woman's thin, dark face and eager eyes. "I am sorry you signed away your rights to Joel," said he at last, "but if the old man's property turns out valuable beyond all that was expected, I shouldn't wonder if the court could rip up that agreement, for the children are still minors and in a way under its care."

Hannah's sinewy hand trembled with eagerness as she grasped the handle of the iron. "I was half crazy when I signed that paper. What with Joel nagging me about Anson's debt to him, and the mortgage on my house coming to foreclosure, and my heart in the grave with him I had lost—for he was a good man—and the children clinging to me and crying, I signed away their right and title. It was after that Mr. Rand came and brought me the paid up mortgage, and then I came to my senses for the first time and the tears moistened my dry and stony eyes."

"I know it all, Hannah," said the doctor, as if coaxing a sick child. "It don't do any good to keep going over those hard places in life. Let us look about and see what can be done in the present."

"Oh, if I could but find that paper acknowledging the payment of the money! It all comes back to me now just how it happened. You see, Anson net Joel in town and paid him and took a receipt, and Joel promised to bring the note next time he drove in from the farm. It was on a Saturday, and before the next Monday Anson lay dead

THE DEMOCRATIC state convention at Worcester this week, re-nominated Wm. E. Russell for the head of the ticket as was universally expected.

THE ACCEPTANCE of the Democratic challenge to meet Hon. John E. Russell in joint debate by Hon. Henry Cabot Lodge, seems not to give entire satisfaction to the promulgators of the challenge. The Nabant congressman embraced the privilege that is usually accorded the challenged party and chose his own weapons, so to speak, which was a special source of discomfort to the authors of the challenge. However, the acceptance and terms have received a partial counter-acceptance and it seems certain that the Governor's administration will be discussed by the two Honorables. As to the other issue proposed, they are a little more than the leaders of the Democracy care to have over-hauled in joint debate. Those subjects they can best handle on their own stamping ground where they are monarchs of all they survey and there right there is none to dispute.

THE SUICIDE of General Boulanger the exiled president of the French Republic is a serious impediment to the prospects of the party of which he was once dictator and leader.

The news that he had committed suicide in Brussels, at the tomb of his former mistress, when received in Paris by his former adherents, was like the dropping of a bombshell into their camp. All their hopes were exploded by the shock and the prospect for the future were veiled in obscurity.

The suicidal act is supposed to have been prompted by a realization that the exile was substantially deserted by those who, while he was in Paris were his friends and supporters. The subsidies contributed by former adherents had become greatly reduced if not altogether cut off and life had no doubt become a burden by the loss of the woman at whose tomb he committed the tragic act and the prospect of future poverty.

THE ATTITUDE of the Irish National League at Chicago yesterday in denouncing the pernicious practice of "hero and worship" and calling to account the parties who have charge of the $200,000 sent from the United States to relieve the Irish peasantry now locked up without reason from the intended beneficiaries, indicates that Irish Americans are beginning to realize the situation. America has been drained of hard earned dollars, austensibly for benevolent purposes, but like many other gratuitous contributions for worthy purposes it takes too large a percentage of the contributions to pay the expenses of distributing the small residue.

The League adopted a plank boycotting English importations, and decided to continue the organization for future emergencies, but was quite emphatic in its resolution to send no more money to the Old Country until the money now locked up is properly distributed. Mr. Parnell is losing his former popularity very fast on both sides of the Atlantic.

THE PEABODY Electric Light plant is now an established institution. The vote of the town on Tuesday evening appropriating fifty thousand dollars for the establishment and temporary maintenance developed this vision of the past into a reality.

Nobody doubted, from the time the bill authorizing such an act passed the Legislature, that the town would avail of the opportunity to install such an establishment, but it was something of a surprise to the majority to see the recommendation for appropriation jump seventeen thousand dollars at a single bound, with a certainty of a future demand of ten to twenty thousand dollars more to complete the undertaking. But the same two hundred and twenty-five who have stood by and howled and hurrahed for a "town plant" for two years past were not to be daunted by the paltry sum of seventeen thousand dollars, and away sped the appropriation. It would have been the same had the amount called for been double that sum; although the committee took the precaution not to arouse the spirit of opposition to too high a pitch by asking for all that is wanted at once. That clause of the report which recommends reference back of the question of lighting public buildings was a very clever device to keep the actual cost of a complete establishment, which must surely come, from becoming too apparent.

The committee is to be commended, however, for the wisdom of its selection in securing the Blaney lot on Endicott street. The water privilege will be of great value in maintaining the plant, as it will facilitate the use of a condensing engine, which can be operated at a saving, of twenty per cent. or more over the cost of operating a non-condensing engine. There is no other place in town available where water could be obtained in sufficient quantity and cleanliness to admit of the use of a condenser.

ESSEX COUNTY.

Susie Pead of Danvers, while riding from Salem to Danvers via Peabody last week, dropped her pocket book from the car while it was going at a rapid rate. She jumped backward off the car to get it and was thrown down injuring her back and head.

Andover has entered into a three years' contract with the electric lighting company to light the streets all night at a cost of $4500.

A Newburyport and Amesbury electric car between Amesbury and Merrimac ran into a cow, and killed it, on Sunday. The car was thrown from the track.

Rev. Michael F. McMannus, pastor St. Patrick's church, South Lawrence, has announced that he proposes to erect a parochial school building, and has already purchased the land.

At Lynn eleven hundred persons since March, have been complained of by their wives, mothers or guardians for being common drunkards. The liquor dealers have been notified not to sell to them. One dealer has been fined $700 for a violation of an order not to sell to a drunken husband.

On Monday the County Commissioners issued an decree granting permission to the city of Lynn to extend Eastern avenue beneath the tracks of the Boston & Maine Railroad. With this avenue extended, as it now will be, to the junction of Ocean and Lewis streets in Lynn, and New Orleans and Humphrey streets in Swampscott, the residents of the shoe city will have a fine boulevard clear across the eastern side of the city; and giving in connection with Western avenue and Ocean streets an excellent environment of the entire municipality.

The annual parade of the several Grand Army posts in Essex county will take place in Salem Oct. 14. The dinner will be served in the Cadel armory, provisions being made for 1000 men. A member of Post 34 Salem will be selected as chief marshal.

Edward Wyman, a salesman employed by Eugene Barry, a Lynn morocco manufacturer, caught his hand in a string attached to a line of shafting Monday. Before he could release himself his thumb was torn from his hand. He was taken to the Lynn Hospital.

The comb manufactory of S. N. Noyes & Company has shut down for want of water. If rain does not come in a few days a supply will be hauled from the river.

The city of Lawrence is called upon to pay its first installment of money due the county for keeping of Lawrence boys in the county school. The amount of the bill is $547.71.

American Artist from Paris.

The Parisian-American, though a type of recent development is not rare in the art world of New York to-day, and he flourishes likewise in literary circles. In London his prototype is the delightful "Continental" Englishman, who, from long residence in France and other countries, has lost all trace of insular prejudice, and has picked up most of what is good and worth knowing from his neighbors. Our New York Parisians began to come home ten or twelve years ago, and they had to fight hard for places in the front ranks of American artists. They were called foreigners who had learned to paint in Paris, and who had nothing in common with true Americans. Worst of all, it was said that they sneered at American subjects. Well, the Parisian has gained his right to stay and to be respected now; and though those who came first have lost their old air, perhaps, they are none the worse for that, and in its place many of them have taken on the firmness and quickness that distinguish the American in professional and business life, and are found among the leaders in everything that helps to advance our civilization, and ready workers in every good cause that tends to improve the condition of native art and education.—Harper's Weekly.

PARK RIDGE, ILL., Sept. 18, '91.
MESSRS. EDITORS:—I suppose you gather from the reports given to the Press in the conditions of our large places in the western world, all perhaps which will interest your readers. But I will give you a slight knowledge of the conditions of our little village.

When I came out here twelve years ago. The village numbered about 500 in its population. It did not grow very fast for 3 years from that time it only increased 200, reckoning the farming district in the item. But within the last two years it has increased to nearly three times its former population. Carpenters have been in demand as the business of building has been and now is pretty brisk. There were 52 houses erected here last year, besides considerable work in improvements around the place. We have an artesian well which is 1500 feet in depth located upon one of the highest ridges which throws its water into every house in the village. We have two churches, Congregationalist and Methodist and a beautiful park near the former church. A population second to none in regard to respectability, with no saloons, and the only public place where a drink can be obtained, is the fountain, where the pure water of the artesian well, flows free to all, without expense or trouble. The Western Rail Road on the Wisconsin division runs through the village, and the passenger travel, is almost equal to all other places on the line of forty miles. The place is 13 miles from the center of Chicago and 7 miles from [the limits]. The crops through the west are abundant, the largest for years. All through Central and North Western Illinois is a corn growing district, the condition not being favorable to wheat, and the crop is mostly out of the way of frost and in stack.

I noticed in your issue of August 22d, an account of the death of Wm. H. Little, by his departure the last of my companions who have hitherto united me to my school days has gone. The last link in the chain which has bound me to the past has snapped asunder and left me "to tread the wine press alone." How many pleasant recollections of our early days does the event call up. How the memory loves to linger over the recollections of our boyhood days as they flit beyond my vision with a vividness equalled only by the experiences of my later western life. In my hours of quiet my thoughts often wend their way back to that one story school house located on the hill, sheltered from the storm without, and more sheltered from the disturbance and disquiet (which often reigns) within.

The sky was all clear, not a cloud was in sight. Not an angry wave beat on the shore. I gazed on the picture all radiant with light, till my vision could bear it no more. On the one side was the bounding of young life, just entering upon its existence free from care, and pressing on to a seemingly glorious future. On the other, the pilgrim of many years, worn out by his contract with the rough, uneven pathway which he had been compelled by circumstances to travel in, and had laid down to his last sleep undisturbed by the noise and clamor which active life always engenders, and to be in peace and quiet while the spirit who gave him life had gone to meet the loved one, as they waited in patience to meet him in the mansions of the blessed.

My friend Little was a giant in our school. He excelled in all things except reading. Any problem in mathematics which other scholars would dread on account of their difficulty, he seemed to covet, and he would work out the same to a solution which would have discouraged those far older than himself, with an ease which would astonish all his school mates.

I went to his seat one day, and he drew from his desk a model of an over-shot water wheel and he had brought in its plan of action to a conclusion which he had done while pursuing his other studies. The power of invention in him was great, but he always found time to attend to the wants of others, and he met them with a smile depicted upon his countenance which won for him a love and respect far surpassing all others in the school. The principals of humanity and right was strongly observed in his nature and that principal governed his life. He was unpretending, his life was not made up for show or effect only reality was the ground work of all his movements. He was but a few months younger than myself. "Only waiting till the shadows are a little longer grown."

Yours respectfully,
J. G. PHELPS.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE.

Shakespeare says throw physic to the dogs, so doctors say of quack medicine, but Dr. Swanton Drake has a sure cure, better than physic, go see him (and laugh) in Fred Marsden's comedy, entitled "Quack M. D.," at the Grand Opera House beginning Oct. 5th, for one week. Sure cure for the blues.

"Natural Gas" has its last inning to night.

TREMONT THEATRE.

Stuart Robson captivated his audience Monday evening at the Tremont Theatre, as Tony Lumpkin in Goldsmith's "She Stoops to Conquer." His entire make-up, including his voice rendered him an ideal of the author's conception. Mr. W. H. Elwood, in the role of Hastings, was particularly pleasing, and portrayed that character in a highly appreciative manner. Mr. Aubrey Bonicaut, son of the distinguished dramatist, played the role of young Marlowe fairly well, but his interpretation was rather overdrawn, although that part is a peculiar one, not so distinctly marked in its boundaries as most others. It was not, perhaps, a character calculated to gauge precisely the calibre of the actor. Miss Mary Waldron appeared to good advantage as Miss Harcastle.

At the close of the performance Misses Waldron and Blisby and Mr. Robson gave an interpretation of the original epilogue to "She Stoops to Conquer," a unique feature, as the same has never before been spoken from the stage, since the original production of the drama on Convent Garden stage in 1773.

Next week is the last of the engagement with Mr. Robson and his company.

"Make Hens Lay."

Such is the caption of an advertisement that appears not only in the local, but many leading agricultural papers and which suggests the propriety of a few thoughts upon the subjects. It may be laid down as a rule that most farmers indulge in raising poultry not for the pleasure it gives, but for the profit that is realized from the same which must come from young chicks or eggs, and since the chicks must come from the eggs the real profit may be traced to egg productions, so the advice given in these words is of vital consequence to the ambitious farmer. "The advertisement referred to recommends Sheridan's Condition Powder to make hens lay and so do we," says Mr. Hunter, poultry editor of the N. E. Farmer. "A hen to lay prolifically must be in perfect health, must be in condition, and here is based the true theory of the value of Sheridan's Condition Powder—it promotes the general good health of the fowl, gently quickening digestion, and stimulating all the various organs of the body as well as the ovaries, to perform their functions." At this season of the year the use of Sheridan's Condition Powder is very valuable for moulting hens and young pullets. By its use now they will get to laying earlier when the price for eggs is very high. Any person buying and using Sheridan's Condition Powder now, will get their hens in good laying condition before cold weather, and stand a good chance to win one of the large gold premiums to be offered later by I. S. Johnson & Co., 22 Custom House Street, Boston, Mass. (the only makers of Sheridan's Condition Powder), who will send for 50 cents, two packs of powder: for $1.00 five packs; for $1.20 a large 2-1-4 lb. can, postpaid; six cans for $5, express prepaid. Six cans will pay a good dividend. I. S. Johnson & Co., will also send to any one asking for it a copy of the best poultry magazine published, free; The paper one year and a large can of Powder for $1.50.

Tannery Notes.

The smoke stack of the New Falls Creek, Pa., tannery of the Thos. E. Proctor Leather Co., is completed. It is 121 feet high. Other work is progressing, and it is expected that the tannery will be completed in April.

A correspondent writes that the Eagle Tanning Co. of Ridgeway, Pa., are now building a railroad, standard gauge, from Hallton up Spring Creek on the east side, between three and four miles. The work of grading is already going ahead. The road will connect with the Clarion River railroad at Hallton and taps the biggest lot of bark and timber on Spring Creek and its tributaries that ever stood out of doors. It will take many years of fast cuttip to get away with it.—Shoe and Leather Review.

your friend Carlyle goes on I don't take much stock in him.

The old man's mouth puckered shrewdly. He liked Hannah's spiciness and thought she had a streak of genius in her. "What a terrible critic you would make, Hannah. You would not leave the poor authors a shred of vanity to cover their nakedness."

"I should like," said Hannah grimly, "to make them novelists hop like a hen on a hot griddle—them that flood the country with sentimental stuff out of their own heads when the world is all red hot with reality—suffering and tears and groans and poverty and wickedness and sin. It makes me mad that folks can't write God's truth if they must write at all."

She went out of the old man's room conscious that she had been rather rude toward his literary aspirations, but she did not hear him chuckling softly to himself at the amusement Hannah's talk had afforded him.

Now it was time to fold Judge Rivers' shirts and Mrs. Price's baby linen and pack them in the basket covered with a dainty blue mosquito netting for Dick to take home when he returned from his work. When the kitchen was all cleaned up, the ironing table set back, the clothes-horse put away, the irons placed in a row on the pantry shelf, Hannah smoothed her hair and put on a clean apron for the afternoon rest. The April sunshine was coming in at her western window, making a warm, ruddy splash on the plastered wall. Hannah drew her rocking chair and little work table into the sunny corner, for rest did not mean idleness to her. She had a pair of Dick's trousers to patch, revealing a complicated hole, six cornered and jagged, that seemed almost as formidable to Hannah as a problem in Euclid. She was just wrinking her forehead over the task of trying to fill this aching void with a round bit of cloth too small to fit it, when there came a tap on the door, and before she had time to say "Come in" the door opened to admit the plump person of Miss Ruby Armstrong.

Miss Ruby was Hannah's nearest neighbor. She lived in a tiny white cottage with a weedy old garden attached, and kept her sister Jane, who had spells of being demented, when she fancied herself the angel Gabriel and would blow shrill blasts on a tin horn out of the window to inform the benighted neighborhood that the end of the world was at hand. But these spells were not very numerous. She was generally quiet and harmless, and not without quick flashes of sense and insight and a knowledge of what was going on about her that made Ruby feel, as she said at times, very "streaked," as if Jane were bewitched. Moreover, she had intervals of remembering things long past which everybody else had forgotten, and suddenly dragging them out to the light in a eerie, elfish way that gave poor Ruby creeping sensations all the way down her spine.

Ruby never knew what was going on in Jane's mind. The poor old creature would sit whole days together in the sun, in a bed ticking gown, made much in the form of a bag tied around the waist with a string, crooning a senseless little song and trying to catch imaginary feathers she saw floating in the air. Then she would fix her strange eyes on her sister and bring out something from the depths of her incoherent thoughts that made the blood run cold.

She was never violent, and at times would take to her bed and sleep for days curled up like a dormouse, when again she did not sleep a wink for a week, but wandered about at night, making a little, low, feeble wail like a lost child. She had a way of purloining small articles and hiding them, and of bringing them out in unexpected moments much to her sister's surprise. Ruby never crossed her in anything except to keep matches out of her way lest she should set herself on fire. So she went and came, muttering to herself or singing eerily, as she pleased. At times she would pull out the old girl's finery she kept in her bureau drawers, and laying off the bedtick would array herself fantastically in a great scoop bonnet and a big flowered shawl, and with a bead bag on her arm would go to visit some of the near neighbors, who always treated her kindly and gave her food.

Jane's insanity was of so mild a type it did not trouble Ruby much, but there were other things quite apart from her peculiar household and haphazard ways of getting along that caused her to take dark views of the world and society. These were principally the homeless village cats and the ill treatment of horses, and in fact of all dumb animals by brutal men and thoughtless boys. The grasshopper was not so great a burden, but when a mangy, half starved kitten with a sore on its hind leg came under Miss Ruby's observation she lost faith in the Providential government of the world and felt that the powers of evil were reveling much as they pleased. One such wail and stray had been cherished and reared by her and had now become as sacred in the Armstrong house as an old Egyptian cat divinity. Any benighted creature in Littlefield who did not know and admire the virtues of the great tortoise shell Crumpet was immediately crossed off Miss Ruby's books.

Miss Ruby was stout—of that soft, comfortable kind of stoutness that easily rolls itself into a ball on a sofa and falls into a catnap on the slightest provocation. Even early in the morning she was always slightly yawning behind her plump hand, as if just aroused from forty winks. She kept no maid, and her little house and untidy garden went along in an accidental, lazy fashion peculiar to herself. There did not seem to be regular meals in Ruby's house. She ate when she felt like eating, and so did her old sister Jane. But there was one thing in which Ruby Armstrong was a perfect adept, and that was the rearing of house plants. Her winter windows were always filled with the loveliest roses and geraniums, and when she had all the flowers she wanted in little pots and tubs and cracked bowls she could live all day on a few prunes, a dry cracker, a cup of tea and an egg.

Now, when Ruby knocked at Hannah's door Hannah at once recognized it as a pessimistic knock, and knew something had gone wrong with the Littlefield cats. She made haste to welcome her visitor, giving her the rocking chair by the sunny window, into which Ruby sank with a big sigh. She threw off her three shawls and a jacket, for Ruby needed a deal of bundling in chilly weather, and let the little woolen hood called a fascinator fall off her back hair. Over this she had tied a lace scarf. She had brought with her a glass of clear red currant jelly.

"It's for Mr. Rand," said she, putting it down on the table. "I thought it might relish in this dry time between hay and grass."

"So it will," said Hannah, and then she added, after a moment's pause, as she snipped away with the shears "I should like to send your sister Jane one of my fresh apple pies. The joke of it is there ain't a mite of apple in it. It's made of soaked cracker and lime juice, but you can't hardly tell the difference."

Hannah put by her work, and stepping into the pantry brought forth a nice flaky pie, which she slipped off the plate and pinned in a clean towel.

"You needn't be so proud," said Ruby, with a little flush, "as to think I brought in the jelly for a return."

"Oh, I know you didn't," said Hannah; "but you must remember it's blessed to give as well as to receive. Things ought not to be all on one side."

"I guess I do look kind of crooked out of my eyes today," said Ruby with a sigh. "The awful wickedness of this world seems to weigh on me like a mountain. I was walking up Sprint's hill yesterday afternoon, where they are mending the road, and there was a burlly Irishman with a poor old rackabones of a horse harnessed to a heavy cart, loaded down with dirt and stone, and he had got into a hole, and the old horse was trying to pull out; and, oh, it was pitiful to see how he straightened himself like a string, and panted and tugged till his knees bent under him, while that brute of a man laid on the blows to make him draw what he couldn't no way draw. So I stopped, and I looked awful, I know I did, and I pointed my umbrella straight at him, and says I solemn as ever I could, 'Have you got a soul?'"

"He took off his old cap and scratched his head and kind of grinned. Says he, 'I dunno.' 'Well,' says I, 'if you had you'd blush for shame for your cruelty to that poor old horse.' Then he grinned again and pretended to be awfully polite. 'Why, mum,' says he, 'do you call that hoss old? He's one of the finest hosses in Littlefield, and he ain't half as old as you be.'"

Hannah gave a little spasmodic laugh as she bent over Dick's trousers, then checked herself suddenly. "It was shameful, downright shameful, Ruby. But what did you do? You certainly would not allow that brute of a man to go unpunished?"

"I went straight to the selectmen sitting there in the town hall," said Miss Ruby severely, "and laid the case before them, and I asked them if this was a civilized, enlightened, Christian country and if there wasn't any redress. I told them, too, how the boys come nights and mewed round our house like sick cats, dressed up in white sheets to pretend they're ghosts, and I asked for protection; and all the men they seemed suddenly to be taken with a coughing fit, and I thought they were all coming down with the grip."

"And that fat old Dr. Buskirk was more polite, but, says he, Miss Ruby we haven't any jurisdiction in these cases unless you can bring witnesses. So I walked home without getting any satisfaction, and I found," said Ruby, with a sob in her voice, "that our big tortoise shell Crumpet, that creature we had every confidence in, so well brought up as he had been, had caught a little young sparrow in the cherry tree and was eating it on our very doorstep. Oh, then Miss Fearing, I did feel that the whole earth groaneth and travaileth together; all things turned black before my eyes. But when I reflected on the way cats are treated in this town, how they are starved and chased and shot at by wicked boys, I couldn't wonder that Crumpet's morals had become corrupted."

"And do you know, Hannah," she went on, "I mean to leave what little money I die possessed of, if Jane goes before me, to a kind of cat's hospital. I'm going to give our house for it, and have a little graveyard in back where the garden patch is so that they may be buried decently. Wouldn't you like to join a society for the protection of cats and sick kittens, and perhaps we might do something for old, wornout horses?"

"I don't believe I should," said Hannah slowly, as she drew out a long thread. "I know there's brutes that abuse dumb creatures and I abhor their cruelty, but I guess, Ruby, if we protected cats the town would be overrun and there would be no sleeping at night. As long as there's ignorant folks that long for teachin' and poor children that can't get it, and miserable babies that oughtn't never to have been born, and neglected old people, and folks out of work too proud to beg, and hard worked women and farmers' wives, and sick folks that need necessities I guess

I must give most of my pity and sympathy to them. I know you mean well, Ruby, and I respect your feelin's. I wouldn't never laugh and think it's just an old maid's notion with you, this love of dumb creatures."

"It was always my way," said Ruby, "to take up with the weakest, and there ain't anything weaker or more unprotected than a cat, unless it's the bird that fights with the squirrels when they're tryin' to drive the birds away from my cherries that they may gobble all the fruit themselves. The Bible, Hannah, don't have a word to say about cats, though it tells us not to muzzle the ox when he treads out the corn. But there's not a word about overloading horses, except it be that a merciful man is merciful to his beast; but that most likely refers to the ass or donkey."

"If I was you," said Hannah, "I wouldn't leave my property to the cats. When you're dead and gone there won't be nobody left in this town to feel about dumb beasts as you do, and your will won't be carried out. I should rather leave the place for a lodging house for tramps, where they could get a bath and a meal and work it out sawing wood, or I would make it into a hospital for sick babies."

"Dunno," said Ruby, nursing her chin in her hand. "There'll be always them that'll take care of the babies, and as for the tramps I haven't the horror of dirt you have. Dirt is the poor man's undershirt, and I can't see as it does him much good to souse him in a tub of water and then let him go and wallow in the next puddle he comes to. There don't seem to be nothing I want to do with my money but to give it to the abused, homeless cats, and the over-worked, galled, sore backed horses."

(Concluded next week.)

A NATIONAL EVENT.

The holding of the World's Fair in a city scarcely fifty years old will be a remarkable event, but whether it will really benefit this nation as much as the discovery of the Restorative Nerveine by Dr. Franklin Miles is doubtful. This is just what the American people need to cure their excessive nervousness, dyspepsia, headache, dizziness, sleeplessness, neuralgia, nervous debility, dullness, confusion of mind, etc. It acts like a charm. Trial bottles and fine book on "Nervous and Heart Diseases," with unequalled testimonials, free at Wm. T. Lee's. It is warranted to contain no opium, morphine or dangerous drugs.

West Point Death Masks.

In a glass faced, black box hung in the officers' mess at West Point are two death masks whose duplicates are not known to exist in this country. One is of Napoleon and the other is of Frederick the Great. Commander Chadwick of the navy secured them in London some years ago and presented them to the mess. To say that they are highly prized is putting it very mildly. There is ample proof for their authenticity, so their startling lack of resemblance to the popular portraits of the dead leaders is all the more interesting.

Napoleon's cast is by far the better. The features are natural and seem to be in a calm repose, while the face is thin almost to emaciation. It's a fine face, but not the face of the Napoleon we have been taught to know. Old Indian fighters say it is the exact counterpart of the face of Black Hawk. Frederick's face is weazen and drawn and fearfully out of shape. It looks like the face of a mummy. One officer at the post is particularly fond of showing the masks, as his friends have told him that he looks like Napoleon, adding to themselves, "Below the waist."—New York Herald.

Impossible.

As to quickness of repartee. Several ladies were sitting together the other day when one of them began to rail at the unequal distribution of the favors of nature. "There," she said, "is Mrs. —, with no end of money and a beautiful voice that would be a fortune to a poor girl. She never sings, and does not even keep up her practice. Why cannot her larynx be transferred to my maid?"

"That would be impossible," said one of the others present, who evidently knew something about sewing machines; "you can never make a Singer out of a Domestic."—Detroit Free Press.

The Armless Wonder.

He uses the harmless wonder, Pearlina, for bathing. A teaspoonful on the sponge or wash rag is enough. You'll find the directions on every package. Try it. It's as clean and refreshing as a Turkish bath—almost nothing to pay—no danger, no more than with good soap—but there's no soap as good. It does more, it's more effective—in the bath as in everything else. And it washes everything—in hot or cold, hard or soft, salt or fresh water. It makes no difference if you use Pearlina. In the laundry and for house cleaning Pearlina makes a saving of dollars for every penny of its cost—every grocer sells it.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearlina." IT'S FALSE—Pearlina is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearlina, do the honest thing—send it back. JAMES PYLE, New York

St. Vitas Nerve Tonic

My boy, 13 years old, was so affected by St.
Vitas Nerve Tonic that he could not go to school for two years. Two bottles of St. Vitas Nerve Tonic restored his health, and he is now attending school again.

MICHAEL O'CONNELL,

BALTIMORE, June, 1890.

I used St. Vitas Nerve Tonic for nervous trouble caused by overwork, and found it all that it is claimed to be. After using one bottle it had the desired effect, and I can truly recommend it to all suffering like complaint, as a really wonderful remedy. SAMUEL THREW,

FARMINGTON, Pa., Oct. 19, '90.

For seven years my eldest daughter had fainting spells and spasms. Last June she took the first of St. Vitas Nerve Tonic, and since that time they have entirely ceased.

WHINSTONE'S VISITOR.

To get money and to keep it, according to Richard Whinstone's catechism, were the two chief ends of man. He was a single man on principle. It was the right thing economically, and therefore right indubitably. To one person in the world Richard Whinstone was generous, and that was his dear friend—Richard Whinstone.

Richard Whinstone had done a good day's work. He had made one or two profitable bargains; he had sold up the Widow Marten, and turned her and her six children out of doors for nonpayment of rent; and, finally, had read a little boy, with a pinched and pitiful face, who had besought the price of a loaf of bread and who said he had a sick mother at home, a lecture on the sinfulness of begging, that evidently touched the little wretch's conscience, for he turned aside and wept bitterly.

"You're a good citizen, Dick," he said,

as he sat down to dinner. "And deserve to be rewarded."

The dinner was one after his own heart. It was a treat he had promised himself if things went right, and they had gone right. He ate, drank and was merry. If his appetite lost its edge, the bottle of burgundy was there to whet

it, and he fell to again, till the last morsel, like Macbeth's amen, stuck in his throat.

Satiety normally begets placidity. The lion, the leopard and the lamb might lie down together any day, with perfect safety to the latter—provided the two former had their bellies full. The boar constrictor, gorged with an ox, betakes himself, for a season, to a life of quiet.

But the effect on Richard Whinstone was different. The expense of a whole sucking pig, wallowing in wine, rested heavily on his conscience, and his brain began to busy itself with schemes of reimbursement.

The current of his thoughts was interrupted by a loud knock. Who could be coming on business at that hour? Some one, perhaps, with a bill to discount in an emergency that would bear no waiting. So much the better, and he hastened to open the door.

"How are you, Dick?" the stranger greeted him, with a familiarity together carelessness for a needy customer.

"I have not the pleasure of your acquaintance, sir," said Richard, in a tone more freezing than politeness.

"But I know you very well," returned the stranger; "and pray don't let us stand here bandying ceremonies, for it's confounded chilly," saying which, he led the way to the apartment Richard had just quitted. "Well, this is comfort,"

he continued, rubbing his hands before the fire. "I haven't felt so much at home

since I left there."

A hasty survey of his visitor added alarm to Richard's astonishment. He was a wiry, ill looking little man. In a rusty suit of black, with a wicked leer on his face and one clubfoot.

"I say, Dick," the little man resumed, holding his hands in the blaze as if they were fireproof, "what an inhospitable dog you are!"

"Whether hospitable or inhospitable," growled Richard, losing his temper as he gained his courage, "is not your business, but I would like to know what is."

"It's bad talking business on an empty stomach."

"I don't see how it's to be helped," answered Dick, doggedly.

"Don't see how it's to be helped, you curmudgeon!" thundered the little man fiercely. "With the remains of such a feast on the table there must be more where it came from."

"Upon my word," replied Richard meekly, for he was getting frightened again, "there is not a bite in the house."

"Don't lie!" roared the other; "there is a cold ham in the pantry and a demijohn of brandy in the closet."

"How do you know that?" it was on the tip of Richard's tongue to ask, but he was too much amazed to speak.

"How do I know it?" broke in the stranger, as if reading his thoughts; "why

I smell them; so bring them out."

Richard would have demurred, but his guest made a movement which convinced him delay might be dangerous, and the required articles were produced.

Without changing his seat the little man

drew up to the table and began to eat.

And how he did eat! A chunk of ham big enough for a shark bait was stuck on the point of a carving knife and thrust down his throat with the audacity of a sword swallower. Another and another followed, till nothing remained but the bone, which he crushed with his teeth and then sucked the marrow

"Now for punch!" he cried.

"There is no hot water," Richard ventured to say.

"Water—who asked for water? Bring me a lemon, some sugar and a kettle."

The kettle was placed on the fire. The stranger filled it with brandy, adding lemon and sugar to suit his taste. As the liquor boiled over it caught fire, setting the whole in a blaze. Richard jumped up to take it off; the stranger caught his arm and flung him back as if he had been a child instead of a substantial citizen of fourteen stone.

"What are you about?" he exclaimed.

"The punch is doing well enough."

"I was only afraid the house might be burnt."

"Neither the house," replied the little man; "there's no danger."

"Your health, Dick!" at length he said, and raising the kettle all blazing to his lips he drank like a dromedary.

"And now, Dick, it's your turn," he said, after a long breath. "You must drink my health now."

Richard drew back.

"Drink!" shouted the stranger, holding out the vessel.

Poor Dick took a single gulp. He left the skin of his mouth on the brim of the kettle, his throat was scorched as with liquid fire and his hair was singed by the blaze.

"And now to business," said the stranger, resuming his seat and leaving

Dick to sit or stand as he chose. "You knew John Walter, I believe."

"Ye—yes," stammered Richard. "I once knew a person of that name."

"You and he went to California together."

Richard acknowledged the fact.

"You made money and he didn't."

"I believe I was the more fortunate of the two."

"You and he started to return together, and he died at San Francisco." Richard bowed.

"His wife and child are now destitute," the stranger persisted.

"I can't help that."

"Of course not. It was his boy you gave the good advice to today. I hope the young scamp will profit by it."

The scene with the little beggar Richard was sure had been witnessed by no one. How the stranger had found it out was past comprehension.

"You're quite sure John Walter died poor?" the stranger went on.

"Oh, quite," said Richard. "I paid his funeral expenses myself."

"That's a lie," retorted the little man.

The "A. B. & W." stands for the best and fastest black cotton hosiery in the market. The black is absolutely fast and stainless. So are several other standard dyes. It is in the fabric that our hose surpass all others.

Especially selected in Chemnitz by a resident buyer for the Syndicate, the greatest care is taken with the material and weaving of these which bear our initials. Four years of great and growing sales have proven to us and to every reader their superiority.

A new and complete stock of the "A. B. & W." fast black cotton and fleeced lined hose for fall and winter is now ready.

"A. B. & W." fleeced lined, black and colors, 25 to 65 cents.

"A. B. & W." heavy cotton, black and tans and slates, 25 to 75 cents.

"A. B. & W." black silk hose for children, plain and ribbed, 50 cents to $2.

Also is the counter roundly stocked with all the other favorites in cotton, fleece lined, cashmere and woolen.

Cashmere hose, black, slates, tans, navy and browns, 50 cents to $1.

Infants' cashmere hose, white and black, all sizes, all lengths, 25 to 50 cents.

Boys' and girls' school hose, light and heavy, single and double knees, all sizes up to 11-inch, 25 to 75 cents.

Ladies' silk hose for party wear, to match the costume, in such shades as Morocco reds,

French grays,
Spanish yellows,
Bronzes, pinks,
blues, lavenders,
cream and pearl,
etc., etc.

Special—60 dozen ladies' Onyx fast black hose, spliced heels and toes, smooth and silky finish, 25 cents a pair. East middle aisle, left.

Any Article that has outlived 22 years of competition and imitation, and sells more and more each year, must have merit. Dobbins' Electric Soap, first made in 1869, is just that article. Those who use it each week, (and their name is legion,) save clothes and strength, and let soap do the work. All that we can say as to its merits, pales into nothingness, before the story it will tell, itself, of its own perfect purity and quality, if you will give it one trial. Ask your grocer for it. He has it, or will get it. Try it next Monday.

There are many imitations N. B. Electric Soaps in which electricity plays no part. Dobbins' is the original one, all Magnetics, Electrics, and Electro-Magics are fraudulent imitations. Ask for Dobbins' Electric, see that our name is on every wrapper, and if any other is sent you by your grocer, when you order ours, send it back to him.

Footprints of the World's History.

Ben Franklin once made the statement, "Schools teach us the rudiments of language, but books teach us how to think; therefore, no man is truly educated unless he is a reader of books." Ben was right, but he lived in an age when books were so scarce, comparatively speaking, that but little of the pernicious in literature was tolerated. But in these days it is different. Your boys thirst for a knowledge of the world, and if you don't give them some wholesome reading to stoke that thirst, they will get hold of cheap, sensational stories that will poison their minds and do them terrible injury.

There is such a vast amount of this trashy stuff being poured into the market at the present time, that it is a relief to pick up a new book that is at once thrilling, romantic, wholesome, pure and true.

Such a work is "Footprints of the World's History," the latest and greatest work of the two celebrated historians, John Clark Ridpath and Wm. S. Bryan. These distinguished gentlemen, having won their laurels by independent writings, have co-operated on this work, and produced a gem "of the purest ray serene." It is not dry, uninteresting statements of the plain facts, but rather each of the most important events of history has been taken up and described by a master of language, who holds the reader entranced as he winds his way along the path of history, following carefully in the footprints of progress.

We are delighted with this superb volume. Perfect in thought, superb in style, and magnificent in execution.

The buildings are sumptuous, as are also the many illustrations and colored plates. The Publishers have rightly concluded that such a gem should have a rich setting.

It is a valuable addition to literature. It is a book for the old as well as the young; the married as well as the single; the gay as well as the grave. Everybody will read it with equal eagerness and profit.

Murdered.

The body of Julius Baer was found by freighters five miles west of here Tuesday morn, in a terribly mangled condition. His head and face were smashed so as to be hardly recognized, and numerous wounds were found on his body. Mr. Baer was agent for the great blood medicine, Sulphur Bitters. Robbery was undoubtedly the motive, as he was well known to have a large sum of money on his person. As we go to press there is no clue to the perpetrators.—Colorado Press.

Then and Now.

In ancient days for many an ill, We used to take a big blue pill. It did so surely tear and gripe, We felt for purgatory ripe.

To-day, when sick, we take Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. They are gently aperient or strongly cathartic, according to size of dose. Cures Sick Headache, Billious Headache, Constipation, Indigestion, Billious Attacks, and all derangements of the Liver, Stomach and Bowels. Attention! Everybody!!

Do you love a cool and refreshing drink of Soda or Moxie? If you do, call for one of Stevens' Best. We can furnish you six days in the week, but on the seventh you will have to go dry. We have at our store all of the stations of both electric and horse cars running in and out of Peabody; but on the seventh day, or Sunday, you will be obliged to stand out of door in the heat or the rain as the case might be, as we have had a notice served on us by the so-called Law and Order League of Peabody, denying us the right to sell Soda, Confectionery, Cigars or Tobacco on that day. Therefore, we were obliged to close as we could not furnish, could not keep open.

GOD BLESS PEABODY!!

She needs it! 10,000 inhabitants and not a hotel or public house in the place! No inducements for strangers to visit us! No wonder our business is dull! No wonder our factories lay idle, our tanneries shut up and all business at a standstill! What we want is liberal sentiment and not littleness of mind! Then we shall grow and prosper as other Towns round about us.

Don't think we are losing courage at this state of affairs. We hope to see them righted and to live to see the good old Town once more redeemed and made prosperous as in the days gone by.

We have a large and fine stock of goods in our store, and we shall try to sell you as cheap as elsewhere. All fruits in their season. Choice Cigars, Confectionery, Tobacco and a thousand things too numerous to mention.

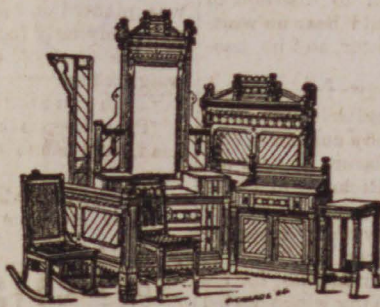

Will try to give you a lunch as well as we know how.

The Borghese Galleries at Chicago.

The news that the Roman government has finally consented to a repeal of the Pacca law, which strictly prohibits, under severe penalties, the exportation or removal beyond Italian territory of any of the art or private possession, cannot fail to prove of vast interest to the world in general, and to the United States in particular. For it involves the disposal of the most famous art galleries in the universe. There is no less than seventy-five celebrated collections of old masters in Rome alone belonging to princely families, such as the Borgheses, the Doria, the Odescalchis, etc., and inasmuch as Europe is at the present moment a vender rather than a buyer of rare and valuable paintings, it naturally follows that most of these chiefs-d'œuvre of ancient art which have hitherto been beyond our reach will find their way across the Atlantic to the western hemisphere in return for new American dollars, sorely needed by the impoverished Italian nobility. Indeed, I understand that a well known and enterprising firm of art dealers is always in treaty for the acquisition of the Borghese collection, comprising almost priceless Raphaels, Titians, Veroneses, Leonardo da Vinci, and Del Sarto, with a view to its exhibition as one of the chief features of the World's Fair at Chicago, prior to its sale, either en bloc or piecemeal, in the United States.

While the negotiations between the syndicate and the representatives of the princely house of Borghese are still in progress, and have not yet been definitely concluded, the fact remains that the dispersal of the Borghese, Odescalchi Doria, and other equally famous galleries is about to furnish us with an altogether unique opportunity of acquiring, at relatively favorable terms, collections equal if not superior to any in Europe. When it is said that the conditions will be favorable to American purchasers, it is because there will be an almost entire absence of competition on the part of European buyers, owing to bad times there, while the noble Italian venders are in such dire straits for want of ready money that they will be ready to dispose of their paintings and statuary at almost any price. Indeed, their financial difficulties are of so aggravated a character that nearly all will hasten to avail themselves of the Pacca law to at once convert their collections and galleries into hard cash, thereby causing the art market to positively glut with old masters.—Harpers' Weekly.

The Merriest Girl that's Out.

"Bonnie sweet Bessie, the maid of Dundee," was, no doubt, the kind of a girl to ask, "What are the wild waves saying?" or put "a little faded flower" in your button hole, as she was so full of vivacity, and beaming with robust health. Every girl in the land can be just as full of life, just as well, and just as merry as she, since Dr. Pierce has placed his "Favorite Perscription" within the reach of all. Young girls in their teens, passing the age of puberty, find it a great aid. Delicate, pale and sickly girls will find this a wonderful invigorator, and a sure corrective for all derangements and weaknesses incident to females.

AN OCTOBER FROST

Is the first hint of winter. It makes you think what comfort there will be a little later in a good warm fire.

Are you going to try to get along another season with that old Parlor Stove that can't heat the room?

Our STERLING Stove will save part of your coal bill and heat the room besides. It is neat and shapely, nickel-trimmed, yet not too full of ornament. It appeals to good taste. It is well made, of best Russia iron (the real Russia iron). It is cemented where the barrel joins the casting, so that ashes and chimney-dampness can't work down and spoil it.

No other firm has the STERLING; we control it. We have an even 100, bought direct from the foundry, and shall make special prices for the two sizes, viz: $17.00 and $20.00. No one else will sell you so good a Stove for any thing like the same figures. Isn't it just as well to save from three to five dollars where you can?

Yes, we can sell you a cheaper Stove than this if you want it, and give you several styles to choose from.

Another thing—the Sterling is New England made, always an important consideration when a stove comes to need repairs. When you call to see the Sterling, ask to see our new Ranges.

Peabody's First Recruit

James Gorman, whose age is 13 years, was sentenced by Judge Merrill last Monday morning, to a term in the newly established County Truant School at Lawrence. This is the first case from this town. There have been plenty of boys who would make proper subjects before the school was opened, but the knowledge of the fact that a place exists where they can now be sent, deters many old timers from their ways of error.

The Horse Show.

The third exhibition of the Boston Horse Show Association takes place Oct. 20, 21, 22, 23, at the new building erected by the Horse Show Association for holding their exhibitions in and for having a general horse building in Boston for riding and other purposes. The new building, which is called the "Arena," is situated on the corner of Tremont and Chandler Sts., Boston, and is the most novel building of this kind in this country and perhaps in the world, as nothing of the kind exists anywhere else. The third exhibition of the association which opens the new building on the above dates will be made as grand and attractive as the previous exhibition, which have been attended by thousands of the B.S. people of Boston and New England. A large number of premiums are offered for all classes of horses embracing everything from the tiny Shetland to the mammoth Percheron. The entries closed Oct. 5th, and all particulars, premium lists and entry blanks can be had of the secretary at Arena Building, Boston.

Beecher at Seventeen.

My first meeting with Henry Ward Beecher was in the early part of May, 1830. He was a classmate of a brother of mine, in Amherst College, and very close friends. The two were just out of their freshman year when, together with another college classmate, they walked from Amherst to my father's house at West Sutton for their spring vacation, writes Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher in the first paper on "Mr. Beecher as I know him," in the October Ladies Home Journal. At that time young Beecher was not quite seventeen years old, but so young and boyish was his appearance that no one would have thought him more than fifteen—an age when boys are usually awkward and painfully bashful. For that reason my family feared we might not be able to entertain or make the young man comfortable. But awkward he never was, and his roguish mouth, his laughing, merry eyes, his quaint humor, and his quick repartee soon dispelled all such anxiety.

Before the first evening he spent at our house had passed, none of the family felt him to be a stranger.

My father was absent with some of his patients when the young men arrived but returned in the evening when all were laughing heartily at some story Henry had just told. Father stood in the doorway—tall, dignified and somewhat stern, at such a tumult. When aware of his presence, my brother at once introduced his classmates.

Little by little the same subtle influences which had pervaded the whole evening's enjoyment stole over father's face, and long before it was time to retire they were telling mirth-provoking stories as cheerfully as if they were boys together.

When at length, the "good-nights" were exchanged, I left father and mother by the fire, while I made some preparations for breakfast.

As I returned to the room, father was saying:

"Well, he is smart! He'll make his mark in the world, if he lives."

"Who, father?" I asked.

"Why, that young Beecher."

Such was Henry Ward Beecher when I first saw him; and, truth to tell, he was not remarkable for his beauty.

One day, not long after this interview Mr. Beecher walked from Amherst to Brattleboro, Vermont, to give a temperance lecture—his first public address. After speaking, he walked back the entire journey, using the money, sent to take him there and back, for books—only preserving enough to buy a single gold ring. The ring, worn out by hard labor while at the West, and mended time and time again—the mending paid for by sewing at night while others slept—was when we came to Brooklyn, so thin it could only be mended by lining, was worn long after that until, after a quarter of a century's use, it could be no longer repaired. To-day it rests close to me as I write—scarcely kept as the result of Henry Ward Beecher's first earnings by public speaking at the age of seventeen!

I once heard a young lady say, showing her engagement ring: "There! I

CABINETS
$4.00
PER DOZ.

Our price has always been $5.00 without deviation; and for two years we have done no club work. We shall probably never sell clubs again, their day having gone by, but there are many who do not care during these dark times to see so much as a dozen for pictures, but who still want the best. As we wish to reach this class, but do not believe in charging two prices for the same thing, we have decided to adopt the medium price of $4.00 for a short time. The quality of work will be the same as heretofore.

always said I would never be engaged if I could not have a diamond ring."

And then I thought of the old worn ring, so carefully treasured, which, half a century ago, cost eighty-five cents, and questioned if there was on earth a ring more precious.

During this time, I was with an aunt in Northbridge, Massachusetts, resting after a long session of teaching, and Mr. Beecher came there during this visit to teach for the first time through a vacation. And here, where he taught his first school, he also preached his first sermon. Evening service was being held in the little, old school-house where he taught and the villagers had requested Mr. Beecher to take charge of it for that evening. At first he was surprised, but he quickly collected himself and consented to preach. How well I remember the look of surprised—almost scorn—on some faces, when this lad of seventeen—rose to address them. Some thought it a farce, until he began to speak. Then attention came levelled at him, for nearly an hour scarcely one in that audience moved in his seat. The sermon was an earnest one, simple yet eloquent. Not once did he hesitate for a single word. Sentence followed sentence as smoothly as if they were uttered by a minister of long experience. Never did he in Plymouth pulpit, or on any other platform, hold an audience more fully under his control, so thoroughly spell-bound—than in this, his first effort.

Young and impulsive, ever ready to respond to the wishes of those who took pleasure in his society, and "thinking no evil" of those around him, it was singular that Henry Ward Beecher was never tempted to participate in many of the indulgences of the day, so common among all classes at that time the same as it is to-day. But, as a young man, he was unusually free from any bad habits. He never smoked, nor used tobacco in any form, either as a boy, youth or full-grown man. He never indulged in a drop of liquor. His language was as pure as his companions as when in a parlor. He rejected all indulgences. As a young man he never played cards and he never knew one card from another. He avoided all these habits in his later years, although he had no prejudice against the playing of cards for others—if played for amusement and at home. After coming to Brooklyn we both learned to play backgammon. It was a quiet game, and he said it helped him to a good night's rest, if his labors during the day had excited him so much as to threaten to retard his usually sound sleep.

The Demorest Medal Contest.

The Essex County Prohibitory Club will hold its quarterly meeting in Temperance Hall, Allen's Block next Wednesday. The morning session will be opened by prayer followed by general business and an address by Rev. B. A. Collins of Beverly. A 20 cent lunch will be served at noon by the W. C. T. U. In the afternoon a paper will be read by the President and an address will be given by F. W. Clark, State Superintendent of the Demorest Contest. At 2.30 essays and recitations in competition for the Demorest medal will be in order. There are 10 contestants.

The Demorest Contest is the first ever held in this part of Essex County. It is for the education of youth in the principles of temperance and prohibition of the liquor traffic, by means of a series of elocutionary contests in which silver, gold, and diamond medals of honor are awarded the successful competitors. It was introduced by W. Jennings Demorest of New York, May 9, 1886. From that date to Dec. 31, 1890, there were awarded 14,934 silver medals, 1,021 gold, 63 large gold, and 3 diamond total 16,021. Nebraska takes the lead in the work, with over 2,000 medals, including all 3 diamonds. Mr. F. W. Clark, state superintendent of contest work, will be present at the meeting on Wednesday, and exhibit the gold and large gold medals.

A. W. GLEASON,

The School Board Meeting.

At the regular monthly meeting of the School Committee on Monday evening, the usual grist of bills were ground through, and a new French text book was adopted for the use of the High School. Some discussion took place upon the matter of more efficient training in hygiene in the primary classes and a committee appointed to look into the matter. Some accommodations at the High School building have been found necessary since the alterations were completed and Mr. Winchester was appointed a committee to ascertain just what will be required. Some additions to the accommodations of the laboratory will be attended to at once, and there are some further details to receive attention, which escaped the observation of the committee while the remodeling was in process.

The annual meeting of the old South Danvers Mutual Fire Insurance company, incorporated 1829, was held Monday evening and the retiring board of directors re-elected. The following officers were subsequently chosen, they being the same as in years past: Wm. P. Clark, president; George M. Foster, secretary; Aaron F. Clark, treasurer.

B. Harrison Taylor has just completed his house in West Peabody. It is situated on Lowell street, not far from the old Daniel P. King place, and commands a wide view of the surrounding country. The house which is of good size, rests on a fine stone under-pinning and has a staple in the rear built to correspond in style with the house. The grounds have been nicely graded. The house is one of the best that has been erected in town this year.

The County Convention was held at Salem Thursday forenoon. Capt. Pitman of Lynn made a characteristic speech and the work of nominating the old stagers sped on its way. The nominations are: County Commissioner—Edward Bishop of Haverhill, Clerk of Courts—Dean Peabody of Lynn; County Treasurer—E. Kendall Jenkins of Andover; Register of Deeds—Charles S. Osgood of Salem; For Councilor—Moses Howe of Haverhill.

The school committee held an adjourned meeting last night. Reports of various committees were heard and accepted. C. F. Winchester was appointed to take charge of the grading and concrete around the High School building; Also to see that water is introduced to boys ante-room, and a set bowl placed there. Messrs. Hudson, Winchester and Goulding were appointed to examine into the wants of the chemistry room in the High School and report on the expense of providing same at a future meeting.

C. H. Goulding was authorized to improve entrance leading to Warren school house. Messrs. O'Connor and Winchester were requested to report on supplying best maps to the various schools. Messrs. Winchester and Foster were appointed to consider the subject of hygiene and its application to the lower primary grades and to report on best methods of application and authorities for same. Mr. Carroll was required to examine the subject of a reference history of United States for teachers desk.

Salary of James Rodie as janitor of High School was made $400 per year. Ordered that Worcester small dictionaries be furnished to the 3rd classes.

The chairman presented his monthly report of which the following is a summary:

Making Taffy at Home.

Some excellent taffy may be made by taking one quart of molasses, and half a pound of butter, and boiling the two until the mass thickens. This will take about half an hour. Then stir with a spoon until, on taking out a little taffy, it becomes hard on immersion in cold water. Taking half a teacup of vinegar, pour into the mass, and stir for half a minute. Then pour the taffy into buttered tins or dishes, and set aside to cool.

Preserving the Complexion.

A great deal can be done towards having a fine and smooth complexion, by a systematic treatment of rubbing. A fine towel or a bit of red flannel are best for rubbing twice a day, or four times if rapid results are to accrue. By degrees as the skin gains tone and elasticity from having thrown off the waste matter in its ducts that kept it clogged, sickly and flabby—the friction can increased in energy. The skin becomes, not tougher, but more resistant. If the rubbing is too hard at first, however, it is liable to produce redness and pimples. Even slight friction will do this at times on an unaccustomed skin. But the treatment should be persevered in nevertheless, and the skin becomes extraordinarily fine and smooth.

Luncheon Muffins.

BY MARIA PARLOA.

For one dozen muffins use one pint of flour, a generous half pint of milk, two teaspoonfuls of Cleveland's Baking Powder, half a teaspoonful of salt, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, three tablespoonfuls of butter and two eggs. Mix the dry ingredients together and rub through a sieve. Melt the butter. Beat the eggs till light and add the milk to them. Add this mixture to the dry ingredients; then stir in the melted butter. Beat the batter vigorously for a few seconds and then put in buttered muffin pans and bake for about twenty minutes in a quick oven.—(Copyright, 1891, by Cleveland Baking Powder Co.)

Use only Cleveland's baking powder, the proportions are made for that.

Cleveland's Superior Baking Powder is perfectly wholesome. It leavens most and leavens best. Try a can.

Hannah Fearing's Fortune.

By AUGUSTA LARNED

(Copyright, 1891, by American Press Association.)

CHAPTER III.

The young man had turned very pale and was trembling.

Ruby got up to take her leave, but it was only the first movement in that direction. She seldom departed by what doctors call the first intention.

"It's a blessed thing," said Hannah, "you've had no worse troubles of your own than to take the sorrows of cats into your heart. If you'd been left poor to dig and scrape, not knowin' which way to turn to get your children a meal of victuals, I guess it would be different, Ruby."

"You're thinking of yourself a misused widow," said Ruby, sitting down again and sinking back in the comfortable rocking chair. "Taint me that's upholding Joel Fearing, or that has a good word to throw at him. I won't take milk of him any more, because he's that mean he contrives to save on the half cent. Do you know, Hannah, Jane has took a notion these days to talk and mutter about Anson—how he comes to see her nights in his shroud—but I can't make out no sense of what she's sayin'. She's happy as the day is long, for she thinks she's a young girl goin' to a ball, and you ought to see her dancin' in her nightgown with a blue ribbon tied round her waist and some old red artificial on her head, a bowin' and twirlin' like a top, for she's just a feather on her feet and always was, and she calls out as polite as can be, 'Ladies chain, all hands round, shashies to the right and salute your partners.' Yesterday she took to makin' up dolls' clothes for one of her dolls, a stick of wood she calls Melindy Armstrong, and she was mutterin' about your husband Anson, talkin' as if he was alive and right here. Strange, ain't it, you never came across that receipt for the money. It seems as though there was some witch work about it."

"So it does," said Hannah, laying down the shears and turning her dark, anxious face and clear eyes on Ruby; "I can see before me now the little tin box he kept his choice papers in, and somehow it has disappeared. I've searched the house from attic to cellar in vain for that box."

"I don't know how sister Jane got hold of the notion there was trouble about Anson's money," said Ruby, after a moment's silence, "but things come to her through the air, I guess, and she sits and mumbles and croons it over to herself. Sybil hasn't come home yet, has she?"

"No, she seldom gets home before five."

"Humph," said Ruby, putting her chin in her hand and studying the clean painted boards of Hannah's kitchen floor, "all right there, I hope. They do say Lawyer Dinsmore is going to make a pile of money out of that big railroad suit."

"Why shouldn't it be right?" returned Hannah, giving her a startled look.

"Oh, nothin'; nothin' in the world," said Ruby hurriedly, "only you know them jokes in the newspapers about pretty typewriters." She got up suddenly, took the pie from the table and with unusual speed made her escape through the kitchen door. Hannah felt a sudden sharp pain in her side. Ruby seemed to have plunged a needle into her most sensitive fiber, and yet she hardly knew why. What were the jokes in the newspapers about pretty typewriters? She had never chanced to see them. She laid aside her sewing with a vague sense of uneasiness, and moved about the kitchen mending the fire and putting on the teakettle for the evening meal—the family supper. There was seldom a regular dinner cooked in that house. Hannah was always too much driven by work to spend time to eat in the middle of the day, and the hot meal was reserved for the time when Dick and Sybil would be at home.

Now there was a chicken to stew and potatoes to bake and hot biscuits to get ready, and when Sybil opened the door the kitchen was redolent of pleasant, steaming odors, and Hannah was laying the table in the sunny corner where the sunset light streamed across the red geraniums on the window shelf and made them glow like fire. Sybil was a tall, slender girl, with golden brown hair shading in little curls and tendrils her forehead, round and arched like a candid infant's, underneath which shone large gray eyes dotted with yellow points of light, and shaded by long silky lashes that rested when closed on cheeks of a clear healthy pallor. There was little color save in the girl's red lips. A certain dreaminess of poetic young girlhood seemed to hang about her, and she was usually quiet and undemonstrative. But the moment she opened the door, though her back was turned, Hannah knew something had gone wrong with Sybil. But there was no remark made, though Hannah watched with her mother's eyes that nothing ever escaped.

Dick came in whistling to his supper and enjoyed the chicken with a boy's healthy appetite. He told some jokes the hands had got off at the chemical works, and how he had "stumped" the foreman with a problem, but Sybil was too listless and languid to listen and only pretended to eat. Hannah remembered that Ruby had said about the pretty typewriters, and a heavy stone seemed weighing on her heart as she stealthily watched Sybil, who excused herself before supper was half over and went to her little room up stairs on the pretext of a bad headache. There was still an hour of daylight, and the sun lay dreamily on the budding trees in Miss Ruby's garden and across the misty, pale green fields of which she caught a glimpse from her one small window. It touched, too, the coarse plastered wall and the little girlish belongings of the toilet table, so white and clean in maiden purity. But Sybil closed the shutters and pulled down the shade and put herself on the narrow bed with her head covered with an old shawl. Convulsive sobs shook the girl's slight frame, but she held her breath and shut her teeth tightly to suppress all sound, for the partitions were very thin.

Hannah, however, had not waited to clear away the supper dishes. She left Dick still engaged on his second plate of chicken, and mounting the stair opened the chamber door and groped her way to the bed. Sybil knew her mother was hovering over her, but she only clutched the old shawl the more tightly and buried her face in the pillow.

"What is it, Sybil, my girl?" Hannah asked, trying to steady her voice and putting her work worn hand down on the girl's silky hair.

"Oh, nothing at all, mother, only spring fever and low spirits, I guess. The light hurts me. I can't bear it, and—and I was thinking how hard it is to be always poor and pinched and kept down in the world. But when I think of you, mother," she went on in a choked voice, "so brave and cheerful with all you do for us, I am ashamed of myself."

"Taint that," said Hannah sitting down on the side of the bed and gathering her girl in her arms, and rocking her with her head on her bosom as when Sybil was a little thing. "Something has gone wrong at the office. I had a presentiment or warning like it would be so. Now I must know the truth. Don't tell me a story. I never caught you in one in all my life."

"I won't, mother," said Sybil, just parting her white lips in a whisper. "Mr. Dinsmore is angry with me, and I guess he's more angry with Ned. He's a hard man, and proud and passionate and unreasonable when once aroused, and perhaps he thought Ned, his son, had been paying me too much attention. And now he threatens to send Ned to California; and oh, mother, I can't go back there any more to work, and I know you need the money I earn," and the girl buried her face on her mother's breast and burst into a passion of tears.

"Ned's been foolin' with you," said Hannah sharply, "and you let him. Haven't I always kep' a-tellin' you to respect yourself and not to allow young men of his class to come anywhere near?"

"Oh, mother," she cried, clinging to her, "don't scold. I didn't mean it, on my honor I didn't. It all came about before I was aware, and it was the same with him. You know, mother, he's been to college and is such a gentleman; and if I never see him again I shall always believe he was true in what he said to me."

"I was afraid it would turn out just so," moaned Hannah, still holding the girl in her arms, "when you took them prizes in the high school and was so much above us in appearin'—as genteel as any girl in this town if I do say it. I don't say you're blameless, but I'd give my heart's blood to save you from sufferin'. I would in a minute if it would do any good. But we must all carry our own load. I've had trouble and so had your father, and there never was a harder working man, yet see how he was tricked and cheated. And Mr. Rand, just look at him and see how he bears his losses, mebbe it will help you to bear yours. You are young, dear, and will get over it in time."

"I must, mother," sobbed Sybil; "I would drown myself before I injured him."

"Hush!" said Hannah sharply, "That's clear impiety and rebellion, and God will punish such thoughts. I shall write to Mr. Dinsmore tonight and tell him you ain't a-comin' any more to the office. He won't have the privilege of dischargin' you, Sybil."

"I guess you had better, mother," said Sybil, who had ceased sobbing, but looked piteously white and wan. "May be then he will make it up with Ned, for I can't bear to think of his sufferin'."

"No, you don't want him to suffer," returned Hannah grimly, "but he's made you suffer, like the selfish fellow he is. He must get some round here, Sybil, or he will get a flea in his ear. I s'pose he's been amusin' himself with the pretty typewriter, as such rich young chaps are apt to. It won't hurt him. Don't you be afraid."

She put Sybil down on the bed again, and covered her feet with the shawl; but the girl put up her arms and convulsively clasped her mother's neck. "Oh, mother, mother," she whispered passionately, "try not to feel bitterly toward him. If you only knew how good he is!"

Hannah could not give the promise. She kissed Sybil, a rare caress with her, and went down stairs with her face drawn with pain and trouble, where Dick, having finished the evening meal, was stooping by the window with slate pencil and algebra, his knees drawn up, to use the last gleam of daylight at his ciphering.

"I'm regularly stuck on this problem, mother," said he, as Hannah appeared. "There isn't anybody to help me out, but I mean to do it if it takes all night."

"Never mind, Dick, it don't matter now whether x equals y. I want you to look up the ink bottle and a pen and a sheet of paper. I've a note to write to Mr. Dinsmore and you must run over to his house with it after you've carried home the basket of clothes."

She lighted a lamp, pushed back the dishes, turned up one corner of the tablecloth, sat down with deep, anxious lines in her forehead to compose her note. Her fingers, so deft at clear starching and ironing, seemed stiff and awkward in holding a pen. It took her a long time to frame a sentence, as the cramped characters showed, and she was never quite sure she had spelled a word correctly, but she would not disturb Sybil to ask her to put the spelling right, and Dick, who was only a lad, was not to know anything of what had happened. It would be time next day to tell him that his sister was run down and needed rest, and had given up her place as typewriter to Lawyer Dinsmore. At last, after inkling her fingers up to the second joints and spoiling two sheets of paper, the note was written in such emphatic, plain terms the lawyer was sure to comprehend.

It was nine o'clock before the dishes were washed and next day's baking of bread molded and put down by the fire, with a clean towel over the pan. Hannah, when the kitchen was tidied, slipped into Mr. Rand's room to see that the old man was properly covered and tucked up in bed. It was a good thing she felt that she had not time to sit down and think. The old man was still awake, and, as she found, in some pain from what seemed an incipient cold. He thought he had taken a slight chill from laying off a thick garment too soon, lured by a treacherous gleam of spring warmth. She gave him a harmless sleeping potion and then waited for Dick to come in, and it was late as usual before the last things were done and she had got to bed. Sybil was restless and slightly feverish and talked in her sleep, and when Hannah at three o'clock stole to the old man's room she found him in still greater pain, with a bad way of breathing, and a slight confusion in his speech that seemed to come from a thickening of the tongue.

She called up Dick in a fright and sent him for the doctor, who came at daylight splashed with mud from the heavy roads, and looking unshaven, haggard and dog tired, having just got in from a long country ride. "Taint nothing serious, is it, doctor?" said Hannah, as she stood on the watch for him outside the door, having hastily huddled on her clothes.

The doctor didn't answer at once, but glanced away. "Have you noticed a slight impediment in his speech?" "You don't think"—and she took hold of his arm with a nervous grasp. "I am afraid, Hannah, it's another light stroke. But he'll come out of it, never fear, though he may not again be quite the man he was."

He hurried away out of the door, leaving Hannah standing with the lamp in her hand, but he had not laid the fee, as he was accustomed to call it, on the table. In a moment he was back again, and had tucked a five dollar bill in Hannah's apron pocket and said brusquely, "You will want money to fill the prescriptions I have left and to buy the old man a few dainties—a little fruit now and then, Hannah."

"But you ain't a rich man, doctor. You practice too much among the poor and forget to send in bills."

The doctor hated to be reminded of his good deeds, and his temper was apt to be a little nasty after a night on the road with one or two bad cases on his hands. "Do as I tell you," said he roughly. "I'd rather wear my old overcoat another three years than have the old man want for anything."

As Hannah was getting breakfast the early morning ray shone cheerily between the houses and lit up the newly made gardens and the elm tree boughs, thick now with dusky brown buds and the delicate tops of the maples turning a pale pink and yellow. She paused a moment in her work and looked at the rosy morning clouds, and it came over her suddenly that she had two sick people on her hands, that Sybil's salary had ceased, and a great pile of custom work unfinished by her sewing machine.

Hannah's heart was full of trouble for the old man, whose bright mind was a little overclouded; for her girl, who had received a stunning blow on the heart, but she was still undaunted. The more she demanded of a woman of Hannah's heroic mold the more her resources are multiplied; and though she had slept but little during the night she girded herself to do a great day's work, and now as she stood and looked at the rosy sky out of her window she caught a moment for silent prayer. It was by such inward exercise she lived through the hard times—the terrible agonies of her life—by a child-like leaning of her strong soul on the infinite fathoms of love and pity.

Two days had passed and the old man was no better. His bright intellect had gone into partial eclipse. He dozed a great deal, and it was sometimes difficult to arouse him when the time came to administer his medicine. But he was always patient, and his native courtesy did not desert him in his pathetic feebleness. The second day when Hannah came to give him his beef tea he tried to rouse himself and to contend with the thickness of his tongue.

"I'm afraid I give you a great deal of trouble," he said; "but perhaps it won't be for long. I want you to have all I leave, Hannah. My watch and my old books—Dick may come to prize them some day—and you will find a will in my early edition of Shakespeare—the 1623, Hannah. That book is valuable, and might bring you money if there is need of it to pay for my"—

"Don't say that," cried Hannah, with a catching sob in her throat. "I love to wait on you, Mr. Rand, and would gladly if there was twenty times as much to do; but you're just like a lamb to take care of," and the warm tears splashed down on the old patchwork quilt.

"There, there, don't agitate yourself," he said, feebly pressing her hand, and in a moment he had dozed off again, with his face looking pinched and gray in the daylight that came in from the little window where the robin was singing. Sybil did not rise that day. She said nothing all day, only she was so tired and wanted to rest. She refused food, and her mother could think of nothing but a white rose as her pale cheek rested on the pillow touched by the long, curling lashes.

It was afternoon when Hannah sat bending over her work rapidly playing her needle. The sky grew suddenly black as a prelude to a thunder shower,

THE EMPEROR'S HAREM.

"139 Unfortunates Held Captive in the Palace at Peking."

The "Palace of Earth's Repose" is where the Empress of China holds her court and rules over the imperial harem, whose only glimpse of the outside world is what they can see in the imperial flower-garden. The present young emperor, in addition to his seven lawful concubines, has already no less than one hundred and thirty others in his harem—H. O'Shea's article, in the Illustrated American. Such is the life of the most highly favored of Chinese women—prisoners within the palace walls they eke out an existence in real slavery. American women know no slavery but that which depends on themselves. Sometimes they are overworked, "run-down," weak and ailing—then is the time to turn to the right medicine. The one who takes Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription emancipates herself from her weakness and becomes a stronger and a happier woman—more than that—a healthy one. For all the weaknesses and ailments peculiar to womanhood, "Favorite Prescription" is a positive remedy. And because it's a certain remedy, it's made a guaranteed one. If it fails to benefit or cure, in any case, you get your money back. Can you ask more?

and a sudden gust of wind made me eddy and whirl in the road. In the turmoil made by the gust, Hannah thought she heard a tap upon her door, and she called out "Come in," and did not even pause to look round, thinking it was Ruby Armstrong. The door opened timidly and some one entered, but as there was no further sound Hannah laid by her work and, to her astonishment, saw a young man standing in the shadow behind her and awaiting a summons to advance. He held his hat in his hand in a deferential attitude and his look was troubled and downcast.

The blood flowed back to Hannah's heart as she arose and clattered the chair with unnecessary noise. Edward Dinsmore had dared to show his face in her house, and presently the crimson tide came rushing back to her brown face, and her proud and loyal soul was in arms. She was like a lioness defending her young ones. The thunder was muttering and a sudden blackness had fallen on the room, but Hannah heeded nothing; she advanced to where he stood and stopped defiantly in front of him.

"Can I see Miss Fearing?" he asked, turning his head a little, and it was sharply bent, as Hannah saw, placed on a good pair of manly shoulders.

"No," said she, bitingly and without ceremony, "you can't see my girl and I would advise you to go away and never come back here again. You've done

IT SEEMS that Hon. William E. Barrett is determined to take another term in the House. The honor of holding the third place has a strong fascination for him.

THE LAST issue of the Beverly Times on Wednesday of this week appeared in enlarged form being now the same size and style as THE PRESS.

That issue marked the ninth milestone in the paper's history, and by way of celebration, Bro. Vitium reproduced the first page of the first issue.

WE HAVE received the first two copies of the Weekly Messenger of Groveland and West Newbury, published by Ambrose & Pike. It is a five column quarto and looks very well for an infant. It will be an exponent of Republicanism, which is a sign of longevity and prosperity.

THE RECENT speech of Mr. Crapo at New Bedford shows that the utmost harmony prevails in the ranks of the Republican party this fall, and we believe his advice to all Republicans to help roll up a great majority for Allen in November, will be heeded by thousands of voters who were not within the sound of his voice when he uttered those magnanimous sentiments.

Mr. Crapo is thoroughly in earnest in his desire to elect Col. Allen to the first place in the government of Massachusetts, and his zeal will be a quickening example to all who love the precepts and principles of the Republican party.

THE NEXT meeting of the Mystic Valley Club at the American House Boston on Tuesday will discuss the question, "Which is the better method of nomination, by caucus or nomination papers?"

The subject is fraught with interest to every voter in the land, and beyond the scope of the above question, opens the general inquiry of the best method for nomination. It is now merely a choice between evils. Some means should be devised that would incite every voter to express freely and intelligently his choice in matters of nomination. There are too many people willing that others should do their thinking and to follow blindly where others lead.

It is seldom a caucus evokes the true, genuine sentiment of the majority, even of those who are present. Artifice and bullying too often lead men to vote differently from what they would were they permitted to express their choice covertly, and uncontrolled by excitements of sentiment or prejudice.

What is needed for a fair caucus is first, a plan to make every voter express himself, and next a provision whereby his expression can be absolutely free and untrammelled.

The Australian ballot system offers possibilities for the accomplishment of the latter, and perhaps if that part of the scheme is perfected first, the former desideratum might follow of itself.

A MATTER in which Peabody will be interested in before many years, is receiving an airing at the State Capitol—the subject of city charters. It is proposed to draft a bill providing for a uniform charter for all cities of the Commonwealth, with a provision that any town upon acquiring the necessary number of inhabitants may adopt the act and receive a stereotype charter.

At the recent hearing before the committee appointed to report upon the subject Mayor Rantoul of Salem appeared and offered some suggestions and presented some objections to the plan. He referred to the fact that Salem's charter was the oldest in the State and mentioned some of its more valuable features as worthy of imitation. Among the objections enumerated, the principal one was that peculiar provisions are often necessary to accommodate the exigencies of individual cases which might be left unprovided for by a ready made formula.

The committee adjourned with a request to Mayor Rantoul that he furnish them a copy of Salem's charter together with such suggestions as he might feel disposed to offer.

There is some force in the arguments of Mayor Rantoul. It is true that, unless great care is taken to incorporate all possible provisions, frequent inconveniences would be likely to be met.

We trust no change will be made without sifting the matter thoroughly.

CHARLES STEWART PARNELL, the distinguished Irish leader, died rather suddenly on Wednesday at Brighton, England. The cause of his death is supposed to be a severe cold contracted last Friday.

Mr. Parnell was an Irishman by birth and was 45 years of age. He has been recognized as the leader of Ireland's cause since his public career began in 1875, until within a few months, when his popularity was tarnished by private social matters which led to political defeat.

What effect his death will produce upon the political situation is as yet only a matter of conjecture, but it would seem that a termination of Ireland's internal dissensions would be effected thereby.

ESSEX COUNTY.

The postoffice in North Andover has become a presidential office.

The water at Wenham lake is reported the lowest for eight years.

Chas. P. Cressy, a Lynn carpenter, will adjust his affair in insolvency.

The Lynn & Boston street railway employees had their annual banquet at midnight of Tuesday.

C. A. Russell of Gloucester has been appointed assignee in the insolvency case of John J. Murphy of that city.

The Beverly armory is approaching completion, and a committee of veteran and active soldiers are arranging for the dedication.

Michael Moore fell from the Hurley Block in Lynn on Tuesday and was taken to the hospital, where he died in the evening. He leaves a family in South Boston.

The Boston Chamber of Commerce on Tuesday elected Lament G. Burnham president; Edward Kemble, vice president; Fred N. Cheney, treasurer, and Francis W. Breed a director for three years. The new building is to be completed Nov. 1, and $22,000 in rentals have already been pledged.

Rev. Edward A. White of Lafayette, Ind., has been selected as the new rector of the Episcopal Church of the Incarnation in Lynn. He is a man of an old Litchfield (Conn.) family, and a graduate of the Wesleyan University of Middletown, Conn., in the class of 1879. For two years he was professor of mathematics in Rutgers College.

The board of health of Melrose are reported to have traced the cause of the diphtheria epidemic in that town to the milk supply, which in almost all the cases reported came from a farm in Saugus where there have been eight cases of diphtheria. The board immediately cut off this source of supply. Of the 30 cases recently reported four have been fatal.

A number of the operatives of the Naumkeag Steam Cotton Company of Salem have been summoned to appear as witnesses before the grand jury at the sitting of the Superior criminal court in Lawrence this week in a test case against the system of fines in vogue in that mill for poor weaving. It is charged the fines are, in violation of chapter 125, Acts of 1891.

The Arena for October will delight thoughtful progressive and wideawake people. The frontispiece is a portrait of James Russell Lowell, taken from the latest photographs of the great poet; it is by far the finest portrait yet published of Mr. Lowell and will be prized by thousands of his admirers. Geo. Stewart, D. C. L., LL. D., who contributed to the July Arena a scholarly paper on Oliver Wendell Holmes, writes most ably and entertainingly of James Russell Lowell, this being the second of The Arena series of papers on American poets. Theodore Stanton contributes a paper of great interest on "Some Weak Spots in the French Republic." Hamlin Garland has a profusely illustrated paper on the artistic work of Mr. and Mrs. James A. Herne; he criticises at length Mr. Herne's most notable plays, giving special attention to "Margaret Fleming" which created such a sensation in Boston last spring, and is booked for a return engagement in the Hub during October and November. Moncure D. Conway contributes an interesting paper on "Madame Blavatsky at Adyar." Other notable contributions are "Leaderless Mobs" by H. C. Bradby, "Emancipation through Nationalism" by Thaddeus B. Wakeman, "Healing through the Mind" by Henry Wood and recollections of Old Play Bills" by Charles H. Pattee. The story of the month is very striking and deals with a timely subject, the Convict Lease System of Tennessee and is entitled "A Grain of Gold;" the author is Miss Will Allen Dromgoole. The editor writes on "Social Conditions under Louis XV. of France" compared with our present conditions, and a short paper on Religious Intolerance. The Book Department, which occupies eleven pages above the regular one hundred and twenty-eight pages of this magazine, contains reviews by Hamlin Garland, Rev. James Miller, D. D., and the Editor.

ABSOLUTELY PURE

The Evolution of the Harvester.

The original cave-dweller—dear child of the Working Scientist—harvested his wheat crop by going out to his field and gnawing off the heads of the grain with his active jaws. The plan had its advantages—on the whole, our all-progenitor longed for something better. Then there arose a thoughtful paleozoic inventor who pointed out that the grain could be pulled up by the roots and the heads thrashed out in the palm of the hand. This satisfied our esteemed ancestor, and matters ran along thus for a few hundred thousands years; indeed, I claim the Working Scientist's privilege to be vague as to years. Let us throw overboard the cave-dweller, for that matter, and come along down to modern times. Let us begin with the sickle for instance.

You may still find old men who will tell you that they can remember when farmers in this country had nothing but the sickle with which to harvest their wheat and rye. A dozen men worked in single file, and cut the grain with one hand and gathered it on the other arm, stopping every "round" to drink earnestly out of a big jug of New England rum or Pennsylvania whiskey. Then came the cradle—a scythe with "fingers" on it—which made the grain lie straight. Many farmers have a cradle yet for corners and old nooks. With it one man cut down the grain and another bound it into sheaves. Then arose a direct descendant of the paleozoic genius, and invented a reaper drawn by horses. This was in the '30's, say. A man drove, and a small boy sat on a low seat and raked off the grain in gables. He was practically the same small boy who used to pull the strings that worked the cut-off valve in the first steam-engine. He soon lost his occupation in both instances—in the case of the reaper they invented a mechanical rake. It took five men to follow on foot and bind up what the reaper cut down. Still the farmer wasn't satisfied. So they made him the harvester. Two men besides the driver rode on this, and bound the grain as it was brought up on an endless apron to where they stood. They had an awning over them, and were very comfortably situated. This was in the '70's. Still the agriculturist fretted. Then he got the self-binder, which he has yet—though he is beginning to find fault with it and talk about electricity.

At first they tried to tie up the grain with wire, but it did not work very well, and the machines were abandoned, and others using manila or hemp twine were tried with better results. The binder invented by a man named Appleby has perhaps been the most successful. The twine of cord is very strong, and is a little larger than a round shoestring. It seldom breaks, and the sheaves are tied up firmer and better than by hand.

The self-binder is somewhat complicated, but it seems simple when we consider what it does. It is the most intelligent machine used on the farm, if I may so express it. It would make the paleozoic man dizzy to watch it. All it asks is that the hired man shall keep his fingers out of it and furnish it plenty of grain to bind up. It does not tie a square or "hard" knot, nor yet a bow-knot. Bring the two ends of a string together for two or three inches from their ends; then, considering the two strings as one, tie one single plain school-boy knot in it, and you have the knot made by a self-binder. It is the hardest knot in the world to untie, and it never "gives" a particle. In the machine it is made by a funny, crafty little thingumbob which turns around half way, opens its mouth and seizes the cord, another thingumbob holds the ends, two arms sweep the sheaf off on the ground, and the binder waits for enough grain to accumulate for another sheaf, when it starts itself and repeats the operation. It works with the precision of a fine steam-engine, if the hired man will only let it alone.—Harper's Weekly.

The story of the Old Bay State, by so popular a writer as Edward Everett Hale, is sure to be received with interest and enthusiasm the country over. "The Story of Massachusetts," as written in strong, terse, graphic lines by Dr. Hale, is about to be published as a subscription book by D. Lothrop Company, and specimen pages, with illustrations, table of contents, etc., are now ready. Agents are wanted everywhere, to whom special terms will be given, on application to D. LOTHROP COMPANY, Boston.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

TREMONT THEATRE.

Next Monday Evening, October, 12th, the production of the original score and orchestration of Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" will be given at the Tremont Theatre by Rudolph Aronson's Opera Co., from New York Cassine. The opera has, as yet, had no American performance outside this city, Philadelphia and New York; but it is in rehearsal already by a half dozen organizations, and promises to have a career in this country unequalled since the days of "Pinafore."

Some idea of the sensation of this opera has created in Europe may be had from the fact that outside of Italy it has been played in 109 theatres and in Italy in 70 theatres, and all within one year.

"Cavalleria Rusticana" is one of the long act broken only by an orchestral intermezzo, which is of such beauty that in its first performance in Italy and also in Vienna this number had to be repeated six times before the audience was satisfied to let the opera proceed.

The wonderful success of "Cavalleria Rusticana" has been made by the extreme beauty of the music, in which the orchestration is said to be remarkably fine.

In addition to this opera the company will also present at every performance, Johann Strauss' Spectacular Operetta "Indigo," with the original New York Casino Cast, and the entire plant of scenery and costumes used in the New York production. Although there will be a double company, chorus and orchestra, the regular theatre prices will prevail. Seats are now on sale.

BOSTON MUSEUM.

The most laughable comedy ever produced by its celebrated author, "The School Mistress" by Pinero, in three acts, was produced on the stage of the Boston Museum for the first time in this country, last Monday night, and at once found favor among the large and select audience.

The following novelties are in preparation and will appear at the Museum before the season draws to a close:—

For the first time on any stage, Lady Jess, a new play as adapted from the novel, "Lady Delmar," of Thomas Terrell and T. L. White, by Mr. Sidney Grundy, author of "A White Lie," "A Pair of Spectacles," etc.

For the first performance in this country; A Sailor's Knot, by Mr. Henry Pettitt, just produced with "gigantic success" at the Drury Lane Theatre London.

For the first performance in Boston, and coincident with its first production in New York; Lady Bountiful, a charming new play by Mr. Arthur W. Pinero.

For its first time on any stage; The Princess of Erie, a new American Comedy by Mr. Henry Guy Cawleton.

For its first appearance in this country; Robin Goodfellow, by Mr. R. C. Carton author of "Sunlight and Shadow."

For its first time in this country; The County Councillor, by Jerome K. Jerome, author of "New Lamps for Old," "The Master of Woodbarrow."

An excursion was run on the Old Colony Thursday to enable South Shore people to see Denman Thompson in the Old Homestead at the Boston Theatre.

Tuesday evening Laura Schlmer Mapleson reappears at Music Hall, in Lucia D. Lammemoor.

De Wolf Hopper in Wang, has the boards of the Globe Theatre next week.

"Ship Ahoy!" will be presented at the Hollis Street Monday and the evenings following during the week.

Neil Burgess is as funny as ever in the County Fair, the permanent attraction at the Park.

Columbia Theatre is now open. The play is "Men and Women."

Lives of others oft remind us Married life may be sublime.

We trust to be forgiven this parody of lines from Longfellow's immortal "Psalms of Life." Husbands who are wise and thoughtful, know that the happiness of the home depends largely upon the health of the mistress of the home. Many are the tasks which daily confront her. How can a woman contend against the trials and worries of housekeeping, if she be suffering from those distressing irregularities, ailments and weaknesses peculiar to her sex? Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is a specific for these disorders. The only remedy sold by druggists, under a positive guarantee from the manufacturers. Satisfaction guaranteed in every case, or money refunded. See printed guarantee on bottle-wrapper.

Peculiar

Peculiar in combination, proportion, and preparation of ingredients, Hood's Sarsaparilla possesses the curative value of the best known vegetable kingdom. Hood's Sarsaparilla is the only medicine of which can truly be said, "One Hundred Doses One Dollar." Peculiar in its medicinal merits, Hood's Sarsaparilla accomplishes cures hitherto unknown, and has won for itself the title of "The greatest blood purifier ever discovered." Peculiar in its "good name at home,"—there is more of Hood's Sarsaparilla sold in Lowell than of all other blood purifiers. Peculiar in its phenomenal record of sales abroad no other preparation ever attained so rapidly nor held so steadfastly the confidence of all classes of people. Peculiar in the brain-work which it represents, Hood's Sarsaparilla combines all the knowledge which modern research has developed, with many years practical experience in preparing medicines. Be sure to get only

LOCAL LINES.

Charles G. Folsom has been drawn to serve on the jury at the criminal term of the superior court at Lawrence, which opens Monday.

The bottling team of Provo of Salem broke down by the collapse of a wheel last Saturday noon, on Central street, just as the pupils of the Bowditch school were coming out, and they were permitted to help themselves to a free drink of light stuff—much to their delight.

Miss M. B. Wilson is said by the ladies to carry the finest line of millinery, laces, feathers and ruchings in Essex county. She has a brand new stock now open and we guarantee it is not inferior to her usual standard, 258 Essex street, Salem.

Engineer Pettet reports 25,636,485 gallons of water pumped during the month of September.

St. John's C. T. A. society held a very enjoyable anniversary ball at Town hall last night. There was a good attendance and everybody enjoyed the occasion. Music was furnished by the Cadet Orchestra. It was their nineteenth anniversary. The ball orders which were of a very pretty design, being decorated with autumn leaves, bore the dates 1872—1891.

The Essex Electric cars will leave you at W. G. Webber's dry goods and fancy ware emporium; or if you are about ready to return to Peabody, you will be made most welcome at that establishment while you are obliged to wait.

Mr. and Mrs. John P. Fernald sailed from New York on Wednesday morning on the steamer Kaiser William II., of the North German Lloyd line, for Havre. They will spend some time in Paris and thence proceed direct to Florence. This is the last trip of that noted boat for the season, and they were very fortunate to be able to take passage at this time.

Our Democratic friends in town should send formal congratulations to ex-President Cleveland upon the birth of his daughter.

Next Wednesday evening is the time for Rev. J. W. Hector to give his reminiscence of the rebellion. This is not a temperance lecture as many imagine.

Has it ever occurred to you that a great saving can be made in buying furniture, bedding or any kind of house-keeping utensils of Titus & Buckley, Union street, Lynn. You should watch their advertisement on the 8th page, but don't fail to give them a call. See their goods and learn their prices.

Edgar W. Upton has removed to Salem and is occupying the house purchased by him some time ago, on Warren street.

The Murray Club held its initial meeting of the season in the parlors of the Universalist church, on Monday evening.

A. B. Russell has an elegant display of crockery ware in all grades, from the choicest imported varieties to the common everyday useful articles. His line of glassware is a delight to behold, and lamps, he carries in every style and variety.

If you have not insured your furniture, go to Merrill's agency in Allen's block, over Lore & Russell's coal office, and take out a policy. It will cost you next to nothing.

The fourth annual assembly of the Casino club will be held in Town hall on Thursday evening, November 5th. Music will be furnished by Langford's Orchestra.

Housekeepers all say there is no bread like the "cream bread" made and sold by C. F. Hathaway. His teams pass through every street in Peabody and Salem. If you have not his calling card, drop him a postal and have the driver leave you one.

The Senatorial convention will be held at Town Hall, Danvers, on Tuesday the 13th, at 10 o'clock, when it is expected that B. Frank Southwick will be re-nominated.

The Naumkeag Clothing Co. has commenced a great sale of Winter overcoats carried over from last season, all guaranteed to be perfect, clean goods and will be sold for about sixty cents on a dollar, comprising men's, youths', boys' and children's. This is a grand opportunity to save money.—Adv.

NEWS SUMMARY.

Reports from Bangor, Me., say forest fires are beginning to rage in the timber land in Northern Somerset. Quite extensive fires have also commenced at Altian Falls, Horeb Mountains, at the mouth of Parlin Stream, and east of Parlin Pond. If rain does not fall soon the damage will be great.

The Cruiser "Yorktown" has been ordered to Valparaiso, Chili. She left New York for her destination this week.

The Phillipsburg Pa., Bank closed its doors Monday. Its liabilities are $380,000 and assets $400,000.

Accounts of County Treasurer Morgan of Towson, Md., are said to be short $24,000.

The local office of the Weather Bureau is receiving a number of letters requesting maps for the use of schools in various parts of New England. The local forecast official Tuesday received requests from the teacher of the Grammar School at Bondsville, from the Harvard School at Cambridgeport and the Melrose High School. Besides these he has received letters from individuals who wish to procure the maps for the purpose of study.

Two Chinese lepers are agitating the municipal authorities of Vancouver. They were shipped in bond from New York.

Halifax, N. S. has a big strike among building mechanics of various branches. One thousand men are out.

James G. Blaine will not take the stump this fall, in Massachusetts or elsewhere.

A woman has appeared in Bangor, Me., who claims to be the widow of the Millionaire publisher Allen. She visits his grave by night to weep and pray.

Frank C. Almy will be tried at Plymouth, N. H., on the charge of murder, November 17.

The Catholic Young Men's National Union convention opened in Philadelphia on Monday.

Suit has been brought by the German House who manufacture "Mumm's Extra Dry" against an American firm that is putting up wine labelled "Extra Dry Eugene Mumm and Calvert, Rheims. The German firm claim there is no firm of Mumm and Calvert and that their copyright has been infringed.

By an accidental explosion at the Ross quarries, Milford on Tuesday, James Conlon was thrown 20 feet and badly burned and bruised.

Rev. Phillips Brooks will be consecrated Bishop next Wednesday.

A New York man whose wife left him because he had a glass eye now sues for divorce for desertion without cause.

It is not probable the international yacht race between the Vamoosa and Norwood will take place, as the latter requires too much time to prepare for the contest.

Autumn Fads in Jewelry.

Small silver fish have taken the place of coins for bangle bracelets.

Silver cologne receptacles, modeled after the New York obelisk are popular.

Ruby marquis rings with one large diamond in the centre are seen.

For lady cyclists a bonbon box of rich gold, having a bicycle wheel of enamel, with a fine diamond in the hub inserted in the cover, is very appropriate.

A bewitching little moonstone cherub flying with outstretched wings through a garland of gold leaves intermingled with diamonds and sapphires, forms an exceedingly pretty brooch design that has been imported from Paris.

A wriggling gold serpent having overlapping scales of various lines, forms one of the latest queen chains. The tail terminates in the swivel for the watch, while the head holds suspended in its wicked-looking jaws a struggling bird of pearls and rubies.

Gold rope circling an anchor formed of the same material, makes a pretty pendant for a glove buttoner.

A carved moonstone in the midst of diamonds set to simulate stars, for the ornamentation of plain gold concave cuff links, is in vogue.

Designs for the ornamentation of silver glove-boxes are usually of the standard repousse flower work, and one that is etched with decorations taken from the interior of Ramises' tomb, shows originality and artistic effect.

A jeweler recently exhibited a lady's gold watch with an ancient English angle set in the back. The coin set in which contained the archangel Michael piercing the dragon, was enhanced by having small diamonds mounted around its rim.

Two variegated love birds circled by a laurel wreath in which small diamonds nestle, constitute a lace pin that will be seen this autumn.

Very unique and, consequently, attractive is a gold ring simulating a handcuff, having a blue-white diamond in the lock.

For a chatelain holder, a silver albatross with outstretched wings, from the feathers of which many fancy chains depend, will undoubtedly meet with approval among those of artistic taste.—Alice Marsh, in the October Ladies Home Journal.

Advertising Epigrams.

Lying advertisements are and always will be failures in the long run.

Pay as much attention to your advertising as you do to your other purchases and you will get equally satisfactory results.

Avoid superlatives, since constant use weakens their effect. Successful advertisers employ the simplest words and forms of expression.

It may be safely asserted that an advertisement possesses more value when it is first printed than it does on second appearance, and that it lessens in value as it grows stale; hence the importance of frequent changes.

"To discontinue an advertisement," says John Wanamaker, Philadelphia's great merchant, "is like taking down your sign. If you want to do business you must let the public know it. Standing advertisements are better and cheaper than reading notices. They look more substantial and business like and inspire confidence. I would as soon think of doing business without clerks as without advertising."

led me straight to the hole in the tree, and if you'll believe it I found my lace scarf and my morocco slippers hid away all a rack of mildew and green mold. But the Lord be thanked, that paper Joel gave to Anson was all safe and sound—saved by a special Providence. She must have stole the box, I don't know when, unbeknownst to us all. And where has she kept it all these years? Mebbe in mother's old red chest in the garret, where she hides most of her duds. But oh, I am that faint and limp I shall swoon away," and Ruby fell prostrate in a convenient rocking chair in a state of complete collapse.

Hannah had sat with her mouth open not understanding a word that Ruby poured forth in such a copious stream, but when she saw the tin box in her lap she mechanically opened it and took up a folded paper, the first that came to hand. It was in Joel Fearing's cramped handwriting, and acknowledged the receipt of a considerable sum of money from his brother Anson, and bore his signature. It was dated only a week before Anson's death. Then it was Hannah's turn to become slightly hysterical, and she found herself hugging Crummet in a way that seemed rather ridiculous when she thought of it afterward. She never knew how she got into her clothes, but in less than half an hour the little house was seething with suppressed excitement. Dick was called up and sent in hot haste for the doctor, who came running over half dressed, thinking the old man was either dead or dying. But when he came out of the sick room he said cheerily:

"Why, Hannah, the old man is much better. His eye looks bright again and his speech less thick and confused. You may let him sit up half an hour in the warmest part of the day. It is the first day of spring and it has brought him new life."

Hannah was pale and erect. She said nothing, but held out a piece of time yellowed paper. He took it and ran his eye over the contents. "Joel's acknowledgment of the payment of that money," he exclaimed, "by all that's wonderful! Why, Hannah, you are a made woman. Where on earth did it turn up after all these years?"

"I don't know; it's all a muddle," said Hannah, smiling faintly. "Ruby Armstrong is too excited to tell a straight story and I have put her to bed. It's all a confused mess; about how while she was watching with Mr. Rand last night she saw Jane come in with Anson's tin box and try to burn the papers over the lamp chimney and was scared off by Ruby, who chased her home and found the doors locked, and then followed the cat to the hollow apple tree in their garden, where the box was found. It appears that Jane must have stole the box out of this house a great while ago and nobody knows where she has kept it. But her mind has been working on it of late, for she has been a-muttering to herself about Anson and how he came and troubled her at night in his shroud."

"No matter, Hannah, how it came back. I guess there was an overruling power somewhere. Now you must let me take the paper; you can trust it to me, and I shall consult a lawyer at once to see what steps are necessary to put you in possession of your rights, the undivided half of the old man's estate."

Ruby had gone home with her cat, still in a slightly dazed condition, and the old man was so much better that at noon Hannah and Sybil put him in his chair, where, backed by pillows and his knees wrapped in a thick blanket, he could look out on the sunny garden. His dear old books were close at hand, so that he could touch them if he pleased with his feeble fingers.

Hannah had aired the room and made his bed with clean sheets and pillow slips. Her motion was quick and nervous as she went about, saying a cheerful word now and then to which he responded with a faint smile.

"I'm an old hulk, Hannah," he said at last, "no longer seaworthy and condemned as not worth saving."

"Don't talk that kind of stuff," said Hannah energetically. "Don't you see the grass thick with dandelions and the cherry blows coming out on the old trees, a sight older than you be, Mr. Rand? What does the Bible say about the day spring from on high? Now that I see you gettin' better and smilin' again I haven't nothin' to complain of, and I just feel like singin' with that robin out in the apple tree."

Sybil sat at the sewing machine working feverishly, with her head bent and the light playing on the warm tints of her hair. She had grown more silent and self contained than ever, and she was a little paler than usual, but she complained of nothing. Hannah had kept this far her secret from Sybil, but the words she had spoken to Ned Dinsmore, "You shall marry her when I come into my fortune," were always sounding in her ears. But as yet she dared not let her hope shine out of her eyes on the sad child who had taken up her life's burden determined to bear it silently.

It was late when the doctor came, and then his businesslike air and quick step told of deeds done. "Well," said he putting down some papers on the table, "you must sign these, Hannah. I have seen Dinsmore and the thing is practically settled. You will get the entire wood lot near town and it will make you a rich woman, for all the building has gone out that way and speculators will give you almost anything you choose to ask for the land. Dinsmore sent for Joel, who happened to be in town with his milk cart, and when he saw that acknowledgment of his, come up as it were out of the grave to point to his rashness and untruthfulness, you ought to have seen him squirm. When asked if that was his signature he was obliged to say it was, and then he began to beg for mercy and promised to give up your quitclaim to the estate and to get right out of town, for it seems he has already sold the old farm. Littlefield will henceforth be a bad climate for him."

"But this isn't all, Hannah. Dinsmore has sent you a message. You see he has had a devil of a time with his boy Ned, who has quarreled with his father and left home in high dudgeon. Now Ned is necessary to the old man there in the office. He wants to leave him his business. He acknowledges he has been hasty and passionate, but this blow has struck him hard."

"Does he expect me to pity him?" Hannah asked sarcastically.

"Well, I guess that's about it, Hannah. The old man has been humbled. Ned has sworn he will never come back until his father consents to his marriage with the girl of his choice."

"No, it's a little money that makes all the difference, doctor. We're just what we were when he drove my girl out of his office with his harsh treatment. No better and no worse, and not a whit prouder!"

"Well, now, Hannah, I know you're as proud as Lucifer, but you must think of Sybil. She isn't strong, and if her heart is set on this young fellow a disappointment might blight her life."

Ten days had passed and now Hannah's little garden was in the perfection of spring bloom. Apple trees made a pink and white border and were snowing down their petals on the little drying lawn starred with dandelions. The lilacs were budded full, and snowballs and spiraea were bleaching hour by hour. Good earthy smells from the freshly turned clods made a delicious perfume mingled with the scents of blossoms and freshly cut grass. Mr. Rand had been brought out well wrapped in his chair and placed under the apple trees, where the sun fell on his white hair and flecked it with slender shadows from the leafy limbs. He was in his old patched dressing gown, but the exquisite neatness of his person was as marked as ever. The doctor and Dick had brought him out, and the former was superintending all the arrangements with his usual directness and tone of authority.

Miss Ruby was there, too, wrapped in her three shawls in spite of the balminess of the day, and with a lace scarf tied over her fascinator to protect her ears, and with Crummet rubbing and purring and arching his back at her feet. At the far end of the garden a young maiden in a light spring gown and a shade hat and a tall, athletic young man were wandering about, apparently quite oblivious of the existence of any one but themselves in that little paradise. The old man looked about with a bright eye and noted the new blossoms and the fresh grass.

"Looks as if it was all ready for a wedding," said he, with a benevolent smile. "Dick, I wish you would get my old copy of Spenser and read to us the 'Epithelanium.'"

"There are two people about as happy as they make 'em," said the doctor, pointing toward the young man and maiden absorbed in each other. "The first house you build on the wood lot, Hannah, must be for them. Then, I suppose, you will be looking out for one for yourself."

"No, no," said Hannah quickly, "I'm homespun clear through. Dick will go to college and Sybil will get married, but Mr. Rand and I will stick to the little old house and the home garden. I should never find anywhere else such neighbors as Ruby and her cat Crummet. Ruby has almost converted me over to her notion of a cat's hospital, and as for you, doctor, God must pay you for what you've been to us all, for I never can; but you need not think to get rid of the care and trouble of us, for we will never move away from under your wing."

THE END.

HEIGHT OF CRUELTY.

Nervous women seldom receive the sympathy they deserve. While often the picture of health, they are constantly ailing. To withhold sympathy from these unfortunates is the height of cruelty. They have a weak heart, causing the shortness of breath, fluttering, pain in side, weak and hungry spells, and finally swelling of ankles, oppression, choking, smothering and dropsy. Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure is just the thing for them. For their nervousness, headache, weakness, etc., his Restorative Nervine is unequalled. Fine treatise on "Heart and Nervous Diseases" and marvelous testimonials free. Sold and guaranteed by Wm. T. Lee.

Fired.

A titled Parisian, after wasting much time in the Latin quarter, finally managed, by hook or crook, to become enrolled as a pupil of Gerome. Day after day the nobleman came, took his place before the model and sketched as best he could. Finally Gerome paused before the new pupil one day and said, "You come here in the morning; what do you do in the afternoon?" "Oh," said the nobleman, "I ride in the Bois, see a few of my friends, and then dress for dinner." "You do," mused the master; "don't you think you'd better do the same things in the morning, also?" The next week a new pupil had the nobleman's place in front of the model.—San Francisco Argonaut.

An Enjoyable Way to Take Tea.

There are people who get more out of life than others by a sort of philosophy of contrast or change. The listener, being invited to tea not long since, found the table set under the apple trees just a few steps from the kitchen door. There were several children seated about the table, expressing by their demure manner that it was not a novel thing at all. "Oh no!" said the hostess; "we've hardly eaten dinner or supper in the house for three weeks. If it's a possible thing we set the table out here or on the piazza at least. There is only one disadvantage, it makes it harder on the girls, but we all take hold and help, so that they are as pleased as we are."

It was delightful to sit under the trees that flecked the table cloth with moving shadows and seemed to add new flavor to the simple food. The house stood back from the street of course, and yet if it had been near the street there might have been a great gain for the passerby. It would have given a touch of sociability to the street, like that so characteristic of the French, who eat in public so gracefully.

It formed a sort of daily picnic, without the toil and bugs and depressing after effects of that great American institution. It added charm and relish to the meal, and made the summer more distinctly a time for vacations and out of door impressions. It seemed a custom that could be profitably followed by many suburban dwellers and it would be a distinct lengthening of the playtime of midsummer.—Boston Transcript

He Changed the Day.

The story is told of the late "Pig Iron" Kelley that on one occasion a young woman, the daughter of an old Pennsylvanian, who had been one of Kelley's political lieutenants, applied to him for a position, which he promised to secure for her the next day. On the following morning, when the young woman called on the judge, he had forgotten all about her case, but upon being reminded, apologized profusely and told her to "call tomorrow." The judge kept this up for nearly a month, when the young woman lost her patience. On the occasion of her last visit the judge, who was very absentminded, did not catch her name as the servant announced her presence in the parlor and, walking hurriedly into the room, shook hands with her and began the old formula.

"My dear young lady, I am very busy today; you will really have to call tomorrow." "But, judge," she protested, "that is what you have told me for a month. I have come almost every day and you have invariably told me to call tomorrow." "I beg your pardon, I am sure," said the judge with great gravity. "Call day after tomorrow."—San Francisco Argonaut.

DANA'S SARSAPARILLA is guaranteed to absolutely cure disease, and it does it too.

The Barn Owl.

How soft is the plumage of the owl, and how noiseless her flight. Watch her as she floats past the ivy tod, down by the ricks and silently over the old wood. Then away over the meadows, through the open door and out of the loophole of the barn: round the lichen tower and along the course of the brook. Presently she returns to her four downy young with a mouse in one claw and a vole in the other, soon to be ripped up, torn and eaten by the greedy, snapping imps. Young and eggs are not unfrequently found in the same nest.

If you would see the midday siesta of these birds climb up into the haymow. There, in an angle of the beam, you will see their owlishness snoring and blinking wide their great round eyes. Their duet is the most unearthly, ridiculous, grave noise conceivable: unlike anything you ever heard. There they will stay all day, digesting the mice with which they have gorged themselves until twilight, when they again issue forth upon their madcap revels.

This clever mouse has a strong claim to our protection: so let not idle superstition further its destruction.—Manchester Times.

The French National Printing Works.

The French national printing works date from the year 1640, and owe their origin to Louis XIII, who established them under the title Imprimerie royale. The works were suppressed at the beginning of the revolution and reorganized in the Year II. The state printing office has had many homes. It is now in the former abode of the princely house of Rohan, in the Rue Vieille du Temple, which still retains traces of its former splendor.

Besides executing all the printing of the ministries and other public bodies, the presses of the Imprimerie nationale are at the service of all private individuals who require in their works types impossible to procure elsewhere. The collection at the Hotel de Rohan is unique and contains 200 varieties. It would almost satisfy the archdeacon of the story whose sermons could not be printed because the printer had only one ton of parentheses in stock.—London News.

Why It Is Popular.

Because it has proven its absolute merit over and over again, because it has an unequalled record of cures, because its business is conducted in a thoroughly honest manner, and because it combines economy and strength, being the only medicine of which 100 Doses One Dollar is true—these strong points have made Hood's Sarsaparilla the most successful medicine of the day.

Why alloys should vary in their properties so widely as they do from the metals which form them is an obscure question. Experiment is still the only means of discovering what properties such and such an alloy will have, or how these properties may be usefully changed by a slight difference in composition.

Girls.

By HELEN EKIN STARRETT, in The Forum.

"Thousands who are now in shops and other organized industries would really prefer work in homes, if only the heavy, grimy, malodorous, clothes-destroying work of cooking and laundering were not required and expected of them."

Well—if this is true there's a good time coming for girls and the mistress too; for women (by millions) are coming to know, that Pearline saves the clothes on your back as well as the clothes in the wash; the paint on your walls—the sheen of silver—the lustre of glass and reduces the labor—drudgery—health breaking—temper and comfort wearing work of washing and cleaning to almost nothing.

Besides—the girl—the mistress—or both—are better satisfied with the results. It cleanses—restores original colors—but hurts nothing, not even delicate skin—luxurious for bathing—be among the bright ones and use Pearline.

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE. Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, do the honest thing—end it back. —JAMES PYLE, New York.

A WINDFLOWER.

Between the roadside and the wood,
Between the dawning and the dew,
A tiny flower before the sun,
Ephephoral in time, I grew.

And there upon the trail of spring,
Not death nor love nor any name
Known among men in all their lands
Could blur the wild desire with shame.

But down my dayspan of the year
The feet of straying winds came by;
And all my trembling soul was thrilled
To follow one lost mountain cry.

And then my heart beat once and broke
To hear the sweeping rain forbode
Some ruin in the April world,
Between the woodside and the road.

Tonight can bring no healing now.
The calm of yesternight is gone;
Surely the wind is but the wind,
And I a broken wall thereon.

—Bliss Carman in Christian Union.

His Audience.

A pretty story, which has, moreover, the merit of being true, is told of a certain professional singer. He had a beautiful tenor voice, of which he was apt to take the best of care, so that when he was crossing the Atlantic one summer with a party of friends, they were not surprised to find that he disappeared from view every evening at just about the same time.

"Afraid of the night air," said one, with a slight smile.

"Afraid we'll ask him to sing, probably," said another, but no one questioned him, as he was known to be quite immovable from his own way.

But when the last night on board came, a delegation descended to his stateroom to beg for a song or two, and discovered that he was not there. They looked for him in vain, until at last the captain, who had evidently kept the secret as long as he could, said, pointing in the direction of the engine room:

"I think you'll find him down there—that's where he's gone every evening."

Sure enough, when the delegation arrived at the engine room, they heard the sound of a guitar and a voice, and there, looting against the wall, was the recalcitrant tenor, singing his best for the delight of the stokers, whom he had entertained in this way for more than an hour every evening during the voyage.—Youth's Companion.

A Telepathic Coincidence.

I had as a guest in my residence in Jamaica a lady of unusual intelligence, who was very intimate with and much attached to Mrs. Beecher Stowe. They frequently corresponded. She had a dream in which Mrs. Stowe seemed to be occupied, singularly enough, in digging the ground, and she inquired if there was any foundation for this. From the reply she learned that Mrs. Stowe had been shortly before in Scotland on a visit to the Duke of Argyll, and had been asked to plant a tree as a memorial of her visit on leaving. Here it is probable that, besides the general sympathy between the parties concerned, there was some special thought, on Mrs. Stowe's part, of the friend who dreamed of her act, connected in time either with the actual handling of the spade or with the remembrance of her strange occupation. Few people would suppose such a coincidence to be purely accidental, unless from the apparent impossibility for accounting for it otherwise.—Blackwood's Magazine.

The Manufacture of Caps.

In that oddest, nestlike part of New York, the French quarter, 2,000 or 3,000 men and girls make annually $5,000,000 worth of caps, exclusive of the $1,000,000 worth made by the furriers of that region. At least 1,000,000 dozen caps are turned out in this quarter every year. As to styles, there are nearly 500 varieties. Of yachting caps alone there are something like two dozen kinds, if, indeed, twosome is not nearer the correct number.

A few leading styles, however, persist with little or no change from year to year. The west constantly demands a cheap cap with ear coverings. Every year sees some cap for girls the rage. Such caps sell by the hundred thousand dozen. A hint comes from Paris, and in a few weeks the new caps swarm in every street.—New York World.

What He Feared.

"While I was in England," says one woman, "I was told of an American who on his first trip on an English railway quite held his breath at the rapid running. When his nervousness rather overcame him he approached the guard."

"I say, guard," he ventured, "this is pretty fast traveling for safety, isn't it?"

"Oh, no, sir," replied the guard; "we never run off the line here, sir."

"But," said the Yankee quickly, resenting the patronage, "it is not the line. I'm afraid of running off your confounded little island."—New York Times.

Amusing Superstitions.

If you count wants you will increase their number, or to handle a toad will cause warts. If two persons wash in the same water or dry their hands on the same towel they will shortly quarrel. To bore a hole in the door frame and put in it the hair of a colored person is supposed to cure whooping cough. The rattle of a rattlesnake if carried in the pocket will prevent rheumatism, or if placed in the bureau drawer will keep away moths.—Philadelphia Ledger.

A new aluminium alloy, with titanium, is being manufactured in Pittsburgh. It sells at from twenty-five cents to one dollar per pound more than pure aluminium. It is very hard and elastic and is an excellent material for making tools. About 10 per cent. of titanium is used.

Some peoples rest the neck instead of the head on hard pillows. In Africa extraordinary headgears make this practice necessary, and many a civilized woman has been compelled by a somewhat similar coiffure to forego both the pillow and the recumbent posture.

A wonderful well is on the property of Colonel W. B. Warshaw of Henrietta, Tex. Its depth of water is usually eight feet; but when the wind is from the north the well becomes dry, and so continues until the wind changes.

A Dog's Love for Another Dog.

I had two puppies of the Molossus, commonly called the Maremma, breed; large, white, very beautiful dogs, with long hair; varying in size between a Newfoundland and a collie; the old Greek race of watch dogs to which, quite certainly, Argos belonged. These puppies, named Pan and Paris, lived together, fed, played and slept together, and were never separated for a moment for seven months. In the seventh month Paris fell ill of distemper and died.

Now, by my own observation, I can declare that Pan nursed his brother as assiduously as any boy could have nursed another: licked him, cleaned him, brought him tempting bits to eat; did all that he could think of, and when his brother at last lay there cold and unresponsive to his efforts, his grief and astonishment were pitiful to see. From that time he ceased to play; from being a very lively dog he grew grave and sad; he had a wistful, wondering inquiry in his eyes which it was pathetic to behold; and although he lived for many years after, and was as happy as a dog can be, he never recovered his spirits; he had buried his mirth in the grave of Paris. Something was lost for him with his brother which he never regained. This is the only instance I have known of a dog's love for another dog.—Ouida in North American Review.

A Plain Truth.

No man has a right to marry till, in every human probability, assured that he can support a family in his own station. Mere love or providential matches seldom turn out well; poverty comes, and there is so much self-reproach on either side that gall is added to its bitterness; their tempers are soured, and they soon wish themselves unmarried. But when trials assail an attached, reasonable pair, sorrow unites them closer; the man, feeling how much depends on him, never flags in his exertion, and often recovers the lost step; if not, there is still consolation in his wife's unvarying love—in her sweet, noiseless sacrifices. In these uncertain times there are few commercial men who have not met with reverses, and they will often say:

"Had it not been for those at home I should have blown my brains out; I could not have stood it."

Wife and children! They are a beacon to us in our troubled sea; we renew the struggle when ready to sink beneath the wave, and at last are saved. At the worst, when all is black—when friends are cool or reproachful—when the cruellest doubts assail us—there is still one who respects and loves us; at home we are still dear.—New York Ledger.

A Giant Horse.

There is in Detroit an equine thoroughbred which is pronounced not only the handsomest, but one of the largest horses in existence. He is in truth a giant, and the veriest novice in horse-flesh could not but view his size and beauty without a certain feeling of awe. This colossal animal is 5 years old and is 21 hands high, weighing 2,365 pounds. An ordinary sized man cuts but a small figure beside him. He is a dark chestnut in color, with superb mane and tail. He is owned by Richard Tregaskis, and can trot in four minutes.

It seems a pity that there will be none of his progeny. He was imported from France by a Kentucky horse breeder, who paid $3,000 for him. When put in the stud the animal became a veritable fiend. He would kick and bite on the slightest provocation, and no one could do anything with him. He soon killed one attendant and a short time after another man fell a victim to the vicious brute. The death of these two men caused the owner to change the animal into a gelding, and with good effect, his temper being greatly improved.—Detroit Free Press.

One Thing Women Can't Learn.

"There is one thing a woman never learns," said a Broadway conductor as he yanked the bellcord, "and that is to get on and off a car with a swing toward the horses. She steps on or off backward—that is, with her face the other way. If the car is moving the least bit she is liable to trip and fall down. Then she looks daggers at me, as if I did the whole thing purposely. A five-year-old boy knows better. Talk about dress reform," he murmured contemptuously, "what a woman wants to reform is in getting some sense about horse cars. She ought to take lessons from her brother."

"People have no idea how much anxiety women cost conductors and drivers. I am that worried about women getting on and off my car that it is with a sense of relief from great responsibility that I turn in my last trip every day feeling that no woman has had her neck broken or fallen down from my platform. We have narrow escapes from that every hour in the day."—New York Telegram.

The Fall Bonnets.

As you see the fashionable fall woman approaching, you wonder if she is wearing a crown upon her head. Her hat is of a material that looks like burnished gold or polished brass. It sets closely to the head in front, and extends upward as if it were going to end, or rather "peak off," into the regulation top for a crown. But she isn't wearing any such mark of power. She has simply put on her fall bonnet and is wearing it, not for the purpose of astonishing the natives, but simply because it is fashionable. If she is a very fashionable woman she has had a piece of her dress material let into the top of her burnished gold hat, and at the very back of the whole affair she has caused a whole field of brass daisies to be fastened upright, so that they nod upon their wiry stems and wave to and fro as their wearer walks or talks, bows or nods.—New York Letter.

THE LEAD MINES OF LO.

TRADITIONS CONCERNING THEM IN PENNSYLVANIA.

A Blacksmith of Former Days Who Ran Into Bullets Ore Supplied by Indians. Pointers That Do Not Develop—Red Men's Pipes and Weapons.

Where, if anywhere, are the lead mines of northwestern Pennsylvania? In connection with attempts to answer this question the writer heretof, in boyhood, harvested many stone bruises by day and treasure dreams by night, together with numerous traditions of the days of practically unbroken forests, bars grease and primeval economy.

This section, comprising parts of northern Venango and southern Crawford counties, is about forty miles south of Corry, sixteen miles north of Oil City, ten miles west of Titusville and eighteen miles east of Meadville. There is no doubt in the minds of plenty of entirely rational people that somewhere within, or contiguous without, the region of country which these towns bound, there is a locality where an exceptionally good quality of lead ore may be obtained, or, at least, the locality where ore of such quality was obtained formerly by the Indians, both for their own use and to sell or trade to the white settlers. As the source of this supply was carefully kept a secret by the Indians—mainly of Chief Cornplanter's tribe—and has never been discovered, it is regarded as reasonable to infer that it may yet be a source of profit as to believe that it was exhausted.

A PIONEER'S EXPERIENCE.

At what is now Bradletown, a village three miles southwest of here, on one of the branches of Sugar Creek, a pioneer named Jacob Jennings lived 100 years ago and had near his pioneer home a small blacksmith shop. From Mrs. Samuel Matson, of Chapmanville, and John Jennings, of Sunville, some interesting reminiscences were obtained as related by their father, who was a son of Jacob Jennings. The latter, at his blacksmith shop, frequently smelted and ran into bullets rich lead ore supplied by the Indians. They made periodical trips to this place for that purpose. Coming up from the Allegheny river they made it a point to reach his home in the evening, there being usually several in the party. They would be allowed to stay and would sleep around the fireplaces in the house and shop. At daybreak they would strike northward up the creek and would return a few hours later with a stock of the lead product to be melted. No amount of persuasion, of barter or of purchase price would cause them to disclose the whereabouts of the lead deposits.

Fifty years ago, according to a member of the family, Mrs. Robert Gillespie and a daughter, then a little girl, were lost in the woods, and during their wanderings found along a ravine an outcropping of lead-filled rock, a piece of which they took with them. After finding their way home they were unable to find their way back with older members of the family to the point where they had found the lead. Various and continuous searches have been made since along the ravines in that section, one enthusiast devoting a considerable portion of a year to the search; but aside from a fragment weighing about four pounds, and found in a field in Randolph township, Crawford county, where it had apparently been dropped, no lead ore has been discovered.

MATERIAL FOR PROSPECTORS.

The prospector able to develop pointers from Indian relics may find considerable material in that line in this section. At Wallaceville, three miles southeast of here, he may find a whole field of yet well defined mounds and excavations. A mile north of here, just across the line in Crawford county, he may find remnants of several large stone piles constructed of stones having notable uniformity in size and piled up by the Indians for some unknown purpose before the time of the earliest settlers. If he will follow the plow for a season in the southwestern part of this township—Plum township, Venango county—or the northerly adjoining township of Troy, in Crawford county, his labors will probably be rewarded with a fresh stock of pipes, weapons and other relics of the noble and ignoble Lo.

If he will further follow the plow in a field along the Sugar Creek flats, about two miles north of the Jacob Jennings homestead, and will fail to lift the point of his plow when he reaches a certain point in that field, his plow handles will smite him hip and thigh and put him to rout. The cause thereof will be that the plow point will strike the edge of a circular bed of burned and pounded stone. It is about ten feet in diameter, projects to the top of the ground where efforts have not been made to get down to the bottom of it, and is known to have been there fully 150 years—how much longer no man knows, as it was then, according to pioneer tradition, as much a matter of mystery and antiquity as at present.

If the lead prospector chooses to consider it of no value to him, he may regard it as one of the places where the Norsemen, poking out this way from Newport and the vicinity of Boston, paused to bake beans. If he is inclined to be less skeptical he may do as tradition says the early settlers did—regard it as the foundation of a sort of Indian crucible or furnace which served in part as a smelter for lead previous to the introduction of firearms on this continent, and for purposes unknown.—*Plum (Pa.) LITERARY NOTES.

"Mr. Beecher as I knew him" is an attractive title, and under it Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher begins her series of personal reminiscences of her husband in the October Ladies' Home Journal. In a delightfully frank manner she tells of her first meeting with Mr. Beecher and how he looked; their courtship and engagement; how he earned his engagement ring; his first sermon, early religious beliefs. The October Journal is absolutely crowded with good things. Major McKinley has his wife sketched for the first time in print, with portrait, in the series of "Unknown Wives of Well-known Men;" the domestic tendencies of New York's social leaders are described in "Society Women; as Housekeepers;" Henry Clevins, the New York banker, tells about "The Making and Saving of Money;" Maria Parloa starts her new domestic department, as does Foster Coates his boys' page; Ella Wilcox discusses "Social Slave Markets;" Susan Coolidge, Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney and Katet Tannett Woods each have a story: "To Entertain Evening Parties is treated fully by six writers; Talma writes very happily, and altogether the October Journal is the strongest number ever issued of this marvelous periodical which has now reached a circulation of 700,000 copies each month. One dollar a year, or ten cents a single number. Published in Philadelphia by the Curtis Publishing Company.

Miss Ethel Parton, the daughter of James Parton, makes her debut as an author with a charming paper on Newburyport, the old historic town in which James Parton lives and works, in the October number of the New England Magazine.

Fat men and women will be specially interested in this week's issue of Frank Leslie's Weekly. Dr. A. D. Rockwell, a famous New York physician, contributes the leading editorial on "How to Get Thin." The pictures include the famous Brooklyn Jockey Club and city pool-room fight, the fire-room of an ocean steamer, character sketches of the New York Democratic State Convention, views in Mankato, Minn., a magnificent full page of the Yosemite Falls, an interesting foreign page, a page of amateur photographs, and many other beautiful presentations. Price ten cents. Get it of your newsdealer.

A MYSTERY EXPLAINED.

The papers contain frequent notices of rich, pretty and educated girls eloping with negroes, tramps and coachmen. The well-known specialist, Dr. Franklin Miles, says all such girls are more or less hysterical, nervous, very impulsive, unbalanced; usually subject to headache, neuralgia, sleeplessness, immoderate crying or laughing. These show a weak nervous system for which there is no remedy equal to Restorative Nervine. Trial bottles and a free

LITERARY NOTES.

There is no evidence in the cosy millinery parlors that "Opening Day" is past. Rather is it a daily, continual Opening, for each day, and well-nigh each hour in the day brings out some new daintiness, some new marvel of our milliner's handiwork.

All are welcome.

Besides our upstairs rooms, we have a counter of open millinery at the right of the door, where are displayed a choice collection of ready trimmed bonnets, babies' caps, and bonnets and millinery materials.

Second floor, front; and at the right of the door.

A fine line of colors in a 50-inch broadcloth, at 75 cents a yard. Not flannel advertised as broadcloth, but true broadcloth.

Note our window display of 25, 37 1-2 and 50-cent dress fabrics.

Rear of main store.

The button department means a vast interest in our business. The newest and most fashionable things are sure to be here in variety.

Of present importance are—Pearl buttons in dress and garment sizes, in natural pearl white and snail shell.

There is nothing, (unless it be the Sewing Machine) that has lightened woman's labor as much as Dobbins' Electric Soap, constantly sold, since 1869. Now, why rub and toil, and wear out yourself and your clothes, on washday, when this perfect soap is provided, to lighten your labor, and save your clothes? If you have ever used it, in the 22 years we have made and sold it, you know that it is the best, purest, and most economical soap made. If you haven't tried it, ask your grocer for it now. Be sure and get the genuine, with our name on the wrapper.

READ THIS TWICE.

It is not the selling price alone, that must be considered, in arriving at a knowledge of the value of an article. There is as much real pure soap in a bar of Dobbins' Electric as in four bars of any other soap made, and it will, if used according to directions, do four times as much work as any other. Its cost is but a very slight advance on that of inferior soap. Insist upon Dobbins' Electric I. L. CRAGIN & Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

The October number is here and is enchanting to the little folks as the preceding numbers have been. With its gay jingles, little stories and pretty pictures, Babyland will quickly captivate the average baby (whether one or six years old.) As it is only 50 cents a year, 5 cents a number, every mother will feel well repaid the investment. D. Lothrop Co., Publishers, Boston.

There are fifty two good reasons for taking Judge, that is one good reason every week. Nothing interests the children more than the bright colored pictures. They also educate in our political life; many a great man is recognized on the street because of the pictures of him seen in the Judge, which are so life-like. Judge this week has a magnificent centre cartoon on "She Stoops to Conquer." Tammany is now at its height and we doubt very much if the entire State of New York will imitate the example of the Democracy. Every boy should write to the Judge Company, 110 Fifth Avenue, New York City, on "How to get a pair of skates."

When you want the best medicine ever made, use DANA'S SARSAPARILLA. It will cure you.

Fashionable circles in New York are much exercised as to the identity of our four pretty American girls who have arrived in London to dance a minuet before the Queen. Their chaperon refuses to give their names, but says they are well known in the best New York Society. A picture, however, is printed in the October number of The New York and Paris Young Ladies' Fashion Bazaar entitled "Pretty girls learning to dance the minuet," which gives some clue to the identity. Society here is also interested in the fact that each of the four Americans is to wear a dress similar to the one illustrated and marked No. 8 in the colored plates of the magazine, which has partly revealed their personality and set fashionable circles agog. The young ladies have been practicing the minuet for eight months before venturing to ask the privilege, which has been granted, of dancing before Her Majesty. The New York and Paris Young Ladies' Fashion Bazaar is for sale by all newsdealers. It will also be sent postage prepaid, for 25 cents per singles copy. The subscription price is $5.00 per year. Address George Munro, Munro's Publishing House, 17 to 27 Vanderwater St., N. Y. P. O. Box 3751

Some idea of what the illustration of a magazine means, may be obtained from the announcement that the publishers of Cosmopolitan paid Madeleine Lemaire for the illustrations of "Three Women of the Comedie Francaise" ten times the amount paid for the article. Madame Lemaire is one of the most famous of French illustrators, and her work in the Cosmopolitan this month is accompanied by that of Kate H. Greator, A. F. Jacassay, F. G. Atwood, Dan C. Beard, W. H. Goater, F. G. S. Bryce, C. R. Grant and others.

A new feature of the Cosmopolitan, and one which is original with that magazine, is the publication each month, in the forms of foot notes, of a number of little portraits with brief biographies, of the writers of various articles.

As the sun is superior to the stars, so DANA'S is superior to all other Sarsaparillas.

An unusual magazine feature, and one which will be read with avidity by women who are curious regarding Turkish life, is an article on "Modern Women of Turkey," by Osman Bey. The most timely article of the number is a description of the New Desert Lake—the phenomenon of the barren region of the south-west. Besides the story by Amelie Rives, Hjalmar Hjorth Boyesen contributes a short story of Norwegian life, in which a beautiful mare figures as the chief character—a charming story for all lovers of the horse. The chief feature of the number however is an article on Cincinnati by Murat Halstead—illustrated by sketches by Jacassay, who visited Cincinnati for that purpose.

Mr. McKinley and the Photographers. It was predicted by the free traders when the McKinley bill was passed, raising the duty on albumenized paper used by photographers, to 33 per cent., that consumers would have to pay an advanced price. Before the rise in the tariff the three houses controlling this kind of paper, formed a combine and raised the price from 22 to 28 cents per pound without any reason whatever. Since the extra tariff was imposed American firms have engaged in the work of albumenizing and the price has thus been reduced to 24 cents per pound. The manufacture of the paper used in the preparation of this material in this country is expected soon to be accomplished, when the price will be reduced still further. The prices for which first-class photographers like W. G. Hussey, 254 Essex street, Salem, are making pictures is sufficient answer to the claims set up by the free traders. Mr. Hussey makes the best cabinets at $4.00, the same as before.

ONLY ONE SARSAPARILLA sold on the "No Benefit, No Pay" plan—only one could stand the test, viz: DANA'S.

Footprints of the World's History.

Ben Franklin once made the statement, "Schools teach us the rudiments of language, but books teach us how to think; therefore, no man is truly educated unless he is a reader of books." Ben was right, but he lived in an age when books were so scarce, comparatively speaking, that but little of the pernicious in literature was tolerated. But in these days it is different. Your boys thirst for a knowledge of the world, and if you don't give them some wholesome reading to stoke that thirst, they will get hold of cheap, sensational stories that will poison their minds and do them terrible injury.

There is such a vast amount of this trashy stuff being poured into the market at the present time, that it is a relief to pick up a new book that is at once thrilling, romantic, wholesome, pure and true.

Such a work is "Footprints of the World's History," the latest and greatest work of the two celebrated historians, John Clark Ridpath and Wm. S. Bryan. These distinguished gentlemen, having won their laurels by independent writings, have co-operated on this work, and produced a gem "of the purest ray serene." It is not dry, uninteresting statements of the plain facts, but rather each of the most important events of history has been taken up and described by a master of language, who holds the reader entranced as he winds his way along the path of history, following carefully in the footprints of progress.

We are delighted with this superb volume. Perfect in thought, superb in style, and magnificent in execution. The buildings are sumptuous, as are also the many illustrations and colored plates. The Publishers have rightly concluded that such a gem should have a rich setting.

It is a valuable addition to literature. It is a book for the old as well as the young; the married as well as the single; the gay as well as the grave. Everybody will read it with equal eagerness and profit. See advertisement on 5th, page.

Put Me In My Little Bed.

I am dizzy, dizzy, dizzy;
And I want to go to bed,
I've no appetite to eat,
And a headache racks my head.

In other words, I am suffering from a bilious attack, but Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets will bring me around alright by tomorrow. They often cure headaches in an hour. I have found them the best cathartic pill in existence. They produce no nausea or griping, but do their work thoroughly. They are convenient to carry in the vest pocket, and pleasant to take. In vials; 25 cents.

A Great Sight.

The Great Southern Exposition opened in the city of Raleigh, N. C., on the first day of October. The Governor of North Carolina delivered the opening speech and welcoming address. Everything passed off in the best shape, and the many Northern people who have taken advantage of the low rate of fare, speak in the highest praise of the reception they are receiving. The show is a great one to the Northern visitors. Much interest is taken in the cotton ginning and packing, and there is a constant crowd around the turpentine and rosin still. Many strange and interesting sights are shown, and every day something new is presented to the visitors. The Exposition lasts during the months of October and November. Tickets can be brought at 239 Broadway, New York and at Bay Line Steamers' wharf at Baltimore.

A great feature of the Exposition is the exhibit made by the negro race. It is worth going a thousand miles to see what the slaves of former years have accomplished in twenty odd years of freedom; and what is shown demonstrates the fact that all the work done for the colored people has not been done in vain. It is certainly an interesting feature to those who have aided in helping the colored people. The railroad rates are low, and every one should avail himself of this opportunity to see the South and learn what the white and colored races are doing.

A Test of Eccentricity.

"The Use of Money"

Is all the advantage there is In Having Money."

Franklin said that—not we—
and how true it is.

Going without something that we really need, in order to lay by a few dollars—what gain is there in that?

Mind you! we say nothing against reasonable thrift. To save is good, but to save too much is to waste.

Let us reason a little.

Your kitchen needs a new cooking range, a Magee or a WINTHROP. Some day you are going to buy it, but you can make the old one do a little longer, you say.

O yes, you can, but why should you? Does it bake well? No! Keep a fire well?
No! Is it roomy and convenient? No! The bread isn't done through, the cake fails, the dinner is late, all because the stove wouldn't "draw."
How many times has that happened? How much did you lose?

And then those awful coal bills; what appetites old horses and old stoves do have! Did you ever figure up the interest on the cost of a range and then compare it with the cost of the coal you waste!

It's just the same in the parlor! You might be enjoying the genial warmth of a handsome STERLING, but you pile on coal and sit and shiver because the old stove "looks too good" to throw away. A stove made of wood might look well enough, but what would it be good for?

Why not think of these things, use your money and be comfortable?

Ask us anything you want to know about Stoves and Ranges. We handle them by the car-load, all kinds.
We make a leader of our stove trade, and can give you better value for the money than any house in the county.

B. FRANK SOUTHWICK,

Receives the Nomination for Senator
Once More.

The Republican Senatorial Convention for the Fifth Essex District was held at Danvers Town Hall on Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock, the same place that has been used ever since the present "shoe-string district" was constituted in 1886.

Henry Artherton of Saugus was elected temporary chairman, and Henry Law of Lynnfield, temporary secretary.

After attending to the preliminaries, the temporary organization was made permanent and the convention proceeded to business, and Mr. South-wick had so much lead on the first informal ballot, that on motion of Capt. Malcom Sillars, the ballot was made formal by a rising vote.

The ballot stood as follows:

Whole number cast	57
Necessary for choice	29
A. P. Tyler	2
Malcom Sillars	12
B. Frank Southwick	43

Mr. Southwick was escorted to the platform, where he thanked the delegates for the renewal of their exhibitions of confidence and esteem.

The following were elected district committee for the ensuing year:

Daniel W. Conant of Boxford, Malcom Sillars, of Danvers, Roger S.
Howe of Georgetown, George S. Symonds of Groveland, W. B. Batchelder of Ward 6, Lynn; B. M. Sprague of Ward 1, Lynn; Edward Randall of Ward 7, Lynn; Henry Law of Lynnfield; Samuel Fletcher of Middleton; E.
C. Stillings of North Andover; B. G.
Hall of Peabody; H. H. Artherton of Saugus and Simon Dodge of Wenham.
Sherman Nelson of Georgetown was elected a member of the state central committee. At the invitation of Senator Southwick the delegates all adjourned to the Berry Tavern where a substantial lunch of salads, ices, etc., was served.

fore, in the Institute.

Death of Levi Spaulding.

Mr. Levi Spaulding, an elderly well-known and respected citizen died rather suddenly on Monday afternoon at his residence on Holten street. He had not been in his usual health for some time previous to his decease, and recently had been confined to the house by illness from which he recovered sufficiently to allow him to be about and last Friday he went to Boston.
Saturday he was taken ill and was again confined to the house until Monday at 3.30 o'clock, when he passed away quietly while reclining in the arms of his son George. His departure is attributed to heart trouble of some kind.

Deceased was born in Winslow, Me.,
June 2d, 1817, and came to South Danvers about the year 1835. After working here about five years for James Felt, with whom he learned his trade, he commenced business on his own account, and has continued in that calling ever since. He has built a great many of the well known structures of this town during that time, one of his latest contracts of a public nature being the Warren school house on Warren street although he has built several private residences since the completion of the schoolhouse.

He leaves a widow and two sons, besides a host of friends, to mourn his decease.

The funeral took place on Thursday afternoon.

Railroad Accident.

A serious railroad accident occurred at West Peabody at the Pine street crossing on Monday. As the Boston & Newburyport train was approaching the Junction at the point above named, Mr. Aaron Danforth a resident of West Peabody was driving along Pine street and being rather deaf it is probable he did not hear the train at least until it was too late to avert a collision.
The train was struck and the horse instantly killed and was carried quite a distance on the pilot of the locomotive.
The carriage was reduced to fragments and Mr. Danforth was quite seriously injured.

The train was running at a local speed of about 15 miles an hour as it was preparing to stop at the station, not many rods away, and when the accident occurred the air brakes were immediately applied and the train backed.

Mr. Danforth was found lying beside the track in an unconscious condition. He was lifted gently to the baggage car and conveyed to Danvers, where Dr. Henry F. Batchelder made an examination and found two ribs broken. The injured man manifested signs also of internal injuries which may result seriously, as Mr. Danforth is advanced in life being 75 years of age. After being made as comfortable as possible he was conveyed to his home in a hack accompanied by the physician.

Silver Wedding.

On Monday evening Mr. and Mrs.
Daniel P. Grosvenor celebrated the quarter centennial of their marriage at their residence on Main street. There were many guests present, among whom were five who attended the nuptials at Woodstock, Vt., twenty-five years before, and of these five, two, Miss T. N. Carter, the soprano of Trinity church, Boston, and Mr. Levi Preston, officiated as bridesmaid and groom.

The host and hostess were presented with many tokens of friendship.

The clergyman who performed the marriage ceremony was too feeble to attend but a letter was received from him and others of that happy day expressing regret at not being able to respond personally to the invitation.

Masonic.

The official visitation of District Deputy Grand Master W. D. T. Trefry and suite to Jordan Lodge F. &
A. M. took place Wednesday evening.
The members of the Suit were Hill of Beverly, Grand Marshal, Clarence O. Hood of Danvers, Grand Senior Warden, George A. Galloupe, of Beverly, Grand Junior Warden, Alvah Warner of Salem, Grand Treasurer, and Albert E. Southwick of this town, Grand Secretary.

The third degree was exemplified and the brethren including 17 visitors repaired to Thomas' Hall, where Mc-

Our Peabody Institute.

The Lyceum Committee of the Peabody Institute has published the names of the lecturers, subjects and dates for this season's course. Cards will be issued in a few days, for the use of the public, from which it will be seen that many of the dates given are incorrect.
Amongst the lecturers which the committee has secured is ex-Gov. John D. Long, whose subject on this occasion will be "Abraham Lincoln." The peculiar interest and importance of the subject when treated by such a master hand, impelled the members of the Lyceum Committee to call a meeting of the general committee of the Institute on Monday evening, at which the entire board was present. The object of the meeting was stated by the chairman of the Lyceum Committee to be in the interest of historical education. The broad and scholarly treatment which such a subject would receive from so distinguished a source would surely be of paramount importance to everyone desiring to form a clear and picturesque estimate of that remarkable man who was so suddenly called to guide the destinies of an imperilled republic, and to be the foremost figure in the most stupendous and sustained revolt recorded in history.
Such a discourse would be from its very nature a source of instruction and incentive to the children in our schools who are studying American history, and as the Lyceum Committee were unanimous on the matter, it was moved that all the scholars from the first classes in the schools be admitted to this lecture. The motion created some discussion, and it seemed the expressed opinion of the members of the joint committee that the schools and the Institute should come close together, that the government and policy of the institution were always eager to facilitate education, and to assist the scholars in every way by giving them access to books of reference, and to point out to them such books as are valuable and helpful in the study of their country's history.
The motion was carried without opposition and the meeting adjourned.

Immediately after the adjournment of the library committee was called, as a fresh lot of books had been received for critical examination. After a close scrutiny by every member the undesirable books, duplicates, etc., were rejected and the others accepted by vote of the committee, and turned over to the Librarian to be numbered and placed on the shelves. It was a particularly nice lot of books, such as one would like for his home. The juvenile books were unusually good and finely illustrated. Amongst them were some of the Knickerbocker series, and "Vassar Girls in Switzerland." A history of the United States by Redpath, which is considered the best compact history published, and is an admirable book of reference on United States history.

Perhaps it is well to know that the most complete and handy work for students on that subject is "Harper's Encyclopedia of American History." It is alphabetically arranged, edited by Benson J. Lossing, and all the articles are clear and concise. There were two volumes embracing a life of Dr.
Johnson's biographer—Boswell—by Percy Fitzgerald, a beautiful volume entitled, "The Lily of the Arno," descriptive of Florence and its surroundings, a valuable addition to those interested in Colonial and Revolutionary research, entitled "Historical Writing in America," and a compilation entitled "The Little Manx Kingdom," by Hall Caine the author of that terrible story, "The Deemster," the scene of which laid in the Isle of Man, and which was dramatized by the English actor, Wilson Barrett under the title of "Ben Machree." There is also a book on "Organic Chemistry" of much practical value. It has been the aim of the committee to procure all books which relate to the application of chemical principles in the process of leather making, and this book though not special, follows in that line. There are many others worthy of attention and which will be ready for circulation immediately. Amongst these is a history of the town of Westboro, Mass.
To the casual observer this book could be of no interest and would be passed over lightly; but it is a history of one of the typical New England towns, written in a quaint and lovely style, reflecting in a manner the struggles, privations, many protests, old declarations, and prompt energetic actions which constitute the history of the people of Massachusetts and the entire New England states. It is not to be supposed that Concord and Lexington were altogether exceptional towns in Colonial Massachusetts. There were many others within her borders in which the sturdy spirit of resistance to tyranny was as strong and as active as that which fired the hearts of the minute men who stood shoulder to shoulder at the old North bridge on that fateful April day in 1775, and the "enbattled farmers" of many a little hamlet from Danvers to Deerfield would have met the invader at the threshold of their township, not furious or passionate, but calmly and sternly, ready to "fire the shot heard round the world" in defence of their liberties.

Universalist Young People Convene

A district meeting of the meeting of Young People's Christian Union of Massachusetts was held at the Universalist church in Salem Wednesday afternoon and evening. Geo. E. Elwell of Boston presided. After a praise service Fred E. Warner of Salem, president of the Southern Essex Christian Union, read an essay on "Obedient to the Law and Spirit of Christ," and Miss N. Jennison of Lynn an essay on "How to Improve our Prayer Meetings." Then followed a general discussion in which Rev. C. S. Nickerson of Boston, H. Marshall of Beverly and others participated. A social hour was enjoyed, and supper was served at 6 o'clock. In the evening, after a praise service, Rev. Mr. Marshall of Beverly gave an account of the meeting of the National Union at Cleveland, Ohio, and other brief addresses followed.

Murder in a quiet Berkshire town.

William Coy was arrested at Westfield on Tuesday charged with a murder that embraced all the horrors of the Whitechapel tragedies.

John Whalen, was a farmer about 30 years old, and sometime since he went to work in Washington Village in Berkshire County, boarding with William Coy in his squalid tumble down home. Sometime in August Whalen and Mrs. Coy arranged an elopement. Mrs.
Coy informed her husband she was going to visit friends in Three Rivers and took her departure having previously arranged to meet Whalen in New York.

She went to Albany stopping a few days when to her surprise, in stead of meeting her lover she was confronted by her husband and was induced to return to her home.

On her arrival she found Whalen missing and his trunk standing in his room ready for the elopement.
She was informed by her husband that Whalen had left for the West and would send for his trunk. The discovery of large pieces cut out of carpeting and bedding however aroused the suspicion of foul play although she says the real situation did not occur to her, but she began to have misgivings about staying in the house and induced her husband to remove to the house of a neighbor where they boarded for a while and later removed to Westfield where Coy obtained other employment.

Suspicion of neighbors became aroused in time and a detective visited the deserted residence of the Coys where an examination of the premises was made, and becoming convinced of the guilt of Mr. Coy, he was arrested this week charged with murder;

Almost simultaneously, a local sportsman was out gunning with his dog on the mountain side a quarter of a mile from the Coy house where the dog unearthed a decaying body which was afterwards identified as that of Whalen; The throat cut from ear to ear, the skull crushed and the legs sawed off at the thighs.

Coy was arraigned on charge of murder, waived examination pleaded not guilty and was committed without bail to await the action of the Grand Jury.

Deafness Can't Be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear.
There is only one way to cure deafness,
and that is by constitutional remedies.
Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed condition you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed. Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for

A SCRAP OF RIBBON

By DAVID DWIGHT WELLS.

CHAPTER I.

She had fainted.

Most men regard five o'clock teas as an unmitigated nuisance, and class them, together with house cleanings, shopping tours and sewing circles as necessary evils imposed by society and dear to the hearts of women. One cause of this feeling may arise from the fact that here, if nowhere else, the lord of creation is put in the background, and is of no use whatever, except to fill up pauses in conversation and throw into bolder relief by his plain attire the more striking costumes of the fair sex. This tea drinking, moreover, seems to many men a useless waste of time, because it is of no practical value in the sight of the world.

Let it be understood once for all, then, that to give a successful five o'clock tea requires great talent and is an art acquired by few, implying as it does the ability to get just the right people together and to let them eat, drink and be merry at the time when the majority of mankind wishes to be doing something else. Mrs. X—, as is well known in Cambridge, possesses this talent in a marked degree, and happy is he who is favored with one of her invitations. I, myself, never fail to attend, and from the crowds that throng her parlors I do not think that I am an exception to the general rule. I do not know whether it is the pleasant people you always meet there, or the beauty of the house, or the delicious wafers you are treated to, or the eggshell cups out of which you sip your chocolate, or last, but by no means least, the charming and soothing and restful, and you go away feeling that you have spent a very delightful half hour. I, indeed, have good reason to remember one of these teas at least, for it was there I first met Miss Ormsby.

She impressed me as soon as I saw her, for she combined qualities unusual in a woman. Tall and slender, with golden brown hair and a fair skin just tinged here and there with a suspicion of the brunette, she presented externally the appearance of a woman easily moved and easily influenced. When you heard her talk you changed your opinion, for you knew that she meant what she said. Miss Ormsby never said, "I think such a thing is so," it was always, "I know it is so," and this was a key to her whole character. Like Pilate, her motto was, "What I have written, I have written;" and her will was as the law of the Medes and Persians, unalterable. Her purpose might be crushed by the force of circumstances, but it was never changed. Without, and to the world as a whole, she was as docile as a kitten; within, and to herself, she was a tigress in strength and brutality. The world at large does not know this and probably will not believe it, for Miss Ormsby is a leader in society and society does not like a tigress; she is like a wolf in a fold of conventional lambs, and is called by the world a strong minded woman. So well, however, did the kitten conceal the tigress that no one has ever suspected her, nor would I if I had not seen her claws.

As I said, I was introduced to her at Mrs. X—'s five o'clock tea, and I at once became interested in her. It is considered a fine thing for a man to be able to size up mentally and morally any woman that he meets; but it is very unpleasant when a woman turns the tables on you and does the sizing up herself. So it was with Miss Ormsby; I knew before I had been talking with her five minutes that she had taken my measure, so to speak, and I also had an unpleasant conviction that the result was not complimentary to myself. Nothing in her conversation, which was confined to social commonplaces, betrayed the fact, and after awhile we drifted apart and I did not see her again that afternoon.

I saw her quite often after that at dinners and teas, and though we talked together on these occasions I never knew her better than on the first day I met her. I often wondered why she tolerated me, for I felt sure she disliked me, but I had to take it out in wondering.

I started into Boston on a warm afternoon in June to attend to a matter of business. Taking a Park square car I rode into Beacon street and from there walked across the Common. When I had gone about half of the way I saw Miss Ormsby approaching from the opposite direction. She was bewitchingly dressed and looked even more fascinating than usual. I was lazy, for it was a hot day, and did not feel energy enough for a protracted conversation; so it was with a determination of not stopping if I could help it that I advanced toward her.

"Ah, Mr. Cummings," she cried, as I greeted her, "you are the very man I want to see. I was looking for some knight to serve me and here he is."

"I have done nothing to deserve that title as yet, Miss Ormsby," I replied,

"but I shall be delighted to win my spurs in your service."

"Very prettily answered," she returned laughing, "but do not be fearful. I am not going to set you fighting any dragon or indulging in any tournament; it might spoil your clothes."

I winced, she was making fun of me, and hugely enjoyed my discomfort.

I put the best face I could on the matter, however, and replied that I should be delighted to slay all the knights and dragons in creation, if she so commanded.

"Why," she said laughing, "it's not quite so bad as all that, but I would be very much obliged to you if you would leave this little package at the ribbon counter at Jordan & Marsh's for me. I know it's a good deal to ask this hot day, and it will be a dreadful bore to you to do it, but you see I have to be in Cambridge in half an hour and can't possibly go myself." I protested that I should be delighted to execute the commission, and asked if there was any message to be delivered with the packet.

"Message! no, indeed! Do you think I know you men so little? Why, I would no more think of giving a man a message than I would of flying. There is a little note inside that explains everything; so all you will have to do is to leave it," and she departed laughing. I stood for a moment or two watching her and then laughed myself. She was certainly very original, and the whole episode rather pleased me.

I sauntered up Tremont to Boylston and did two or three small errands on the way. Then I started down Washington street, but only got as far as the Adams House, where I saw a friend in the office, and just dropping in to chat with him for a minute stood nearly half an hour. Suddenly I remembered the packet, and my conscience smote me, perhaps Miss Ormsby wanted it delivered in a hurry, and I had forgotten all about it.

I was soon at Jordan & Marsh's, and after some trouble found my way to the ribbon counter. Speaking to the first girl that confronted me I said: "I was requested to leave this little package here. I suppose it is expected." The girl hesitated for a minute, and while she did so another young woman came hurriedly up and taking the package said: "Yes, it is all right—the purchase was made from me; I am expecting it." I handed it to her and turned away, saying as I did so that the message was inclosed within.

I had scarcely gone more than a step or two when I heard something heavy fall, followed almost instantly by a cry of dismay from the girls at the counter. Turning around I saw that the girl to whom I had given the packet had fallen to the floor, and a moment sufficed to discover that she had fainted. A little crowd had gathered around her, but she was at once carried away to a dressing room near by, where she received such assistance as was necessary. I was left alone by the counter. Before me lay the package, which she had let fall when she fainted. It was opened and I saw that it contained a sample of purple ribbon and no writing of any kind whatever; evidently it could have had nothing to do with her faintness, which I supposed was caused by the heat of the day.

It was a bore anyhow, and I hated scenes. Why could she not have fainted a little later, and have given me a chance to have got out of the way? Most of the people who saw it, I suppose, thought I had something to do with it, and if I stayed here much longer I should make a fool of myself. I accordingly moved off to another part of the store; but before I could get to the street I was met by several of my lady friends, who seemed much amused to see me in Jordan & Marsh's. I was glad they had not seen the little episode; I should never have heard the last of it. My little conversation with these ladies, however, took up some time, and when I reached the main entrance I was annoyed to find that the girl who had fainted was just being helped into a cab. I followed her out of the store, saw her put into the carriage and heard the driver directed to a house in a poor but respectable part of South Boston.

CHAPTER II.

He turned very pale and staggered like a drunken man.

I had scarcely noticed the girl when I gave her the ribbon, but as she left the store I looked at her more closely and saw that she was singularly refined for her position, besides being remarkably handsome. I determined to follow her and find out something about her if I could. Waiting, therefore, till she was well out of sight I called a cab and ordered the driver to take me to the street in which she lived. I soon stood before the house; it was very plain and unpretentious, being built of red brick, with green blinds, and having a door in the center. Within the door a very unattractive servant girl was scrubbing the floor of the little hall. I made up my mind that this must be a cheap boarding house and determined to interrogate the girl concerning the lodgers.

"Does Miss Mason live here?" I asked; I had learned her name at the store.

"Yes," returned she snappishly.

"What's that to you?"

"Nothing in particular," I replied, a little disconcerted at this unexpected question. "She was taken ill at the store and I fear I may have been the cause of it. I only wished to inquire how she was."

"Oh, I reckon she's all right," replied she of the scrubbing brush, and returned once more to her task, which my question had interrupted.

"Is she at home?"

"No; she just went out. Did yer want to see her?"

"But I thought she was ill?" I said, surprised at this piece of information.

"Not much, I guess; she ain't been gone more'n a minute."

"Did she say where she was going?"

"Yes; Mallen. That's where her folks used to live. She said she wouldn't be back tonight."

Evidently I could find out nothing more from this source, and I was just about to turn away when a gentleman brushed by me up the steps and started to go into the house.

I recognized him as Frank Holden, whom I had met several times in Boston and Cambridge society. In his hurry he had not recognized me, and I was about to pass out when his conversation caused me to stop. As he went by the girl she caught him by his coat and said, "It ain't any use goin' in, Mr. Holden, she ain't there."

"What! isn't Miss Mason at home?"

"No, I guess she's got tired of waiting for you, you ain't been here in so long; this last remark with a coarse laugh.

"Oh, come, Lizzie, my good girl," he replied, "I've been busy, and could not help it. I think I will wait, however; she may be back soon."

"I guess she won't."

"I think she will. But tell me, Lizzie, is she ill?"

"No, she ain't. She came home from the store this morning sick."

"Sick!" he exclaimed, and started violently.

"Yes, had a fainting turn; she cried, and—"

I had been standing by all this time, wondering how the dence the fashionable Frank Holden knew anything about this girl, and what he wanted to see her for. I now joined in the conversation, and stepping forward interrupted Lizzie, and said, "Excuse me, Mr. Holden, but as I happened to be at Jordan & Marsh's when Miss Mason fainted, perhaps I can give you the information you desire." He recognized me and thanked me, though at the same time I could see that he was annoyed at my presence.

"The illness is nothing to be alarmed at or startled about," I said, "merely a little fainting attack, the result of a shock; she must be much better, as she has gone out."

"Yes, of course. Excuse me if I seem to be curious, but I am anxious to know what caused the shock?"

"Why, certainly," I replied, growing more and more surprised as the conversation continued. "She received a package the contents of which seemed to startle her."

"Yes, I know; it was a sample of ribbon."

How the devil did you know it though? thought I to myself, but I did not say so. "Red ribbon, wasn't it?" he continued. "But of course it was."

"No," I replied, "it was purple."

If I had struck him a blow in the face he could not have been more startled. He turned very pale and staggered like a drunken man. I looked at him, too astonished to speak. "Purple?" he gasped; then, without giving me time to speak, he continued: "There must be some dreadful mistake; you say she went out?"

"Miss Mason? Yes."

"Where did she go? Do you know?"

"I was told she had gone to Malden on business by this girl here."

"Good God! she'll kill herself if I can't get there first to stop her! Where can I get a cab? Tell me quick."

"Here's mine—you are welcome to it; can I give you any assistance?"

"No, nothing; I am the only one who can save her. This is an awful sort of marriage day for her thoughtful, poor girl."

"Marriage day! Who was going to marry her?"

"I was," he cried, and jumping into the cab rattled away up the street and out of sight in a moment.

I was astonished. I am not generally—it takes too much exertion. I looked at the servant and saw that she was as astonished as I was, for she stared after the carriage for a moment and then laughed. That was the difference between her astonishment and mine. I tried to think out some solution for the mystery, and she, like all uncultivated people, and the majority of women, laughed at what she could not understand.

Her laughter grated on me, and I said somewhat sharply: "I see nothing to laugh at. Do you?"

"The young gent used to be mighty sweet on her a while ago, but he hasn't been near her for more'n three months, and now just because she ain't at home he gets riled," she replied and laughed again.

I walked away thinking and very much puzzled. I was already becoming suspicious of the whole matter. Were all these things that had happened coincidences? I thought not. But if they were not then they depended on each other, and how that was possible I could not understand. Could it be that I had been used as a tool in this matter by Miss Ormsby, and that the package contained something more than I knew of? But what possible connection could there be between the beautiful Miss Ormsby and the little shop girl? Why should Mr. Holden be going to marry a girl whom he had not seen for three months? Why should she kill herself, and how could he prevent it? And lastly, what had the scrap of purple ribbon got to do with the affair, anyhow? For there was no doubt in my mind that it was the link that bound the whole mystery together.

The saying that if there is any mischief brewing there is always a woman

NO CAPITAL NEEDED! No risk, but $10 to $15 a day profit. Teachers, Students, Ministers, Bright Men and Women, all can succeed in every town and county. No experience needed. Credit given if desired. Be early this time and secure first choice of exclusive territory on this grand new book.

FOOTPRINTS OF THE WORLD'S HISTORY.

By WM. S. BRYAN and JOHN CLARK RIDPATH, The World's Celebrated Historians.

The Story of the Nations as told in the brilliant deeds and grand achievements of the World's Heroes and Heroines. A rich storehouse of History, Travel, Adventure, and the weird and wonderful events of the times that tried men's souls. Thrilling stories of the days of chivalry, stirring heroic achievements of warriors and crusaders. Also a vast collection of the rarest gems of English and American Historical Literature. The most wonderful New Book of today, the great self-educator; just the book the people want. Over 350 grand historical illustrations, half-tone steel engravings, and brilliant colored plates. Everybody finds it a bonanza of success. It sells without asking. No capital, no risk. Straight business and big profits. Splendid illustrated circulars and full particulars sent free. Address:

WHAT

SCOTT'S CONSUMPTION EMULSION

CURES

Wonderful Flesh Producer.

Many have gained one pound per day by its use.

Scott's Emulsion is not a secret remedy. It contains the stimulating properties of the Hypophosphites and pure Norwegian Cod Liver Oil, the potency of both being largely increased. It is used by Physicians all over the world.

PALATABLE AS MILK.

"Get another dozen lamp chimneys."

"What! are they all gone?"

"Yes."

"I'm going to try a sort I've been reading about, if I have to send to Pittsburgh for 'em, Macbeth & Co.'s 'pearl-top.'"

"They say their chimneys don't break."

"Another humbug, probably."

"Don't Muggins keep 'em?"

"I'm going to see. Give me a postal card. I'll have that chimney, anyhow."

Muggins got 'em for him, and did a thriving chimney business for several weeks, till everybody got 'em; and some of his trade has increased round ever since.

Every one suffers from Catarrh in the Head. Those who don't have it suffer from those who do. It's a disease you can't keep to yourself.

Here are some of the symptoms: Headache, obstruction of nose, discharges falling into throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody, putrid, and offensive; eyes weak, ringing in ears, deafness; offensive breath; smell and taste impaired, and general debility. Only a few of these likely to be present at once.

The cure for it—for Catarrh itself, and all the troubles that come from it—a perfect and permanent cure, is Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. The worst cases yield to its mild, soothing, cleansing and healing properties. A record of twenty-five years has proved that to its proprietors—and they're willing to prove it to you.

They do it in this way: If they can't cure your Catarrh, no matter how bad your case, or of how long standing, they'll pay you $500 in cash. Can you have better proof of the healing power of a medicine?

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1891.

It is Mr. Francis H. Appleton again against Mr. Philip H. Coleman. Mr. Appleton has made a satisfactory record for himself, the party and the town, and we see no reason to doubt his re-election on the third of November.

THE PARLIAMENTARY colleagues of Ireland's deceased champion have issued a manifesto indicating that though Charles Stewart Parnell is dead the cause to which he devoted his life lives on.

THE NOMINATIONS for Senator in this, 5th, Essex District are made on both sides now, and there is nothing left in that direction but to see that all the voters are out on election day to mark the conventional cross against the name of B. Frank Southwick and this district will be once more reclaimed from the hands of the Democracy.

ONE OF the best campaign arguments and one of the most instructive disquisitions upon an abstruse subject, is Henry Cabot Lodge's article on Protection in the November Arena.

At the present juncture, when the Democratic press of the country teems with abuse of the McKinley tariff and attempts by falsehood and sophistry to prove it a failure and a hindrance to prosperity, Mr. Lodge's article comes like a reserve corps to rally the forces and drive the free trade delusion from the field.

WHEN THE struggle is over, and the votes are counted up on election day, Peabody will be in a position to view without regret the results of the great Republican tidal wave which will have swept over the entire state. Everything indicates certain success of all the Republican nominees of local interest, and on the morning of November fourth the stranger visiting this township will be led to think that Democracy is unknown in our midst.

DOUBTS HAVING been entertained of the identity of the body interred at Market Lake, Idaho, as that of Robert Ray Hamilton, great grandson of the distinguished Alexander Hamilton, the remains were recently exhumed and carefully examined by a medical expert and fully identified as those of Hamilton who was represented to have met his death in August a year ago. Thus it appears the remains of a gentleman of noble family, who had represented a large constituency in the Assembly of the Empire State, and enjoyed in former years the ease and luxury afforded by wealth and culture, was buried in a lonely grave in the solitude of a forest of the far west. And the melodrama of his life and matrimonial connections are brought to a solemn close.

His alleged widow who shocked the sensibilities of the country by the assault upon her nurse with a dagger has yet to establish her claims to dowry before the courts.

A DESPERATE attempt is being made to re-elect Governor Russell by Republican votes, because he is young and as is claimed he has made good governor, as if it were something unusual for the Executive Department of the Old Bay State to be judiciously managed, or else that some peculiar credit is due the present incumbent on account of his tender years.

If youth is a desideratum in a governor, Col. Charles H. Allen will not fall far short of filling the bill, but if added to youth the voters of Massachusetts desire, which they certainly do, integrity, zeal, candor, fearlessness flavored with a suitable degree of dignity and grace, there is absolutely no need to go outside of party lines to select a man possessing these qualifications. Col. Allen combines all the virtues that have been attributed to the Democratic incumbent and more.

With Col. Allen at the head of the State government, Republicans need have no fears for a clean, faithful dignified administration of affairs, and when the Presidential campaign of next fall opens, Massachusetts will stand where she has ever stood in times of National elections as a beacon light for wavering sister states.

IN LAYING out the free lecture course for the coming season, the committee have curtailed the liberal scope which was indulged in a few seasons past. It has been the custom for quite a number of years to introduce some variety of programme by arranging for at least one concert and one or more readings by elocutionists of distinction, but the present course is confined strictly to lectures, which though instructive to those who are interested will hardly win universal appreciation.

It has been urged by some, and the opinion is held by members of the Board of Trustees, that the employment of musical talent is unwarranted by the terms of the endowment. In this matter there is room for a difference of opinion, even though the phraseology appears at first glance plainly in keeping with the argument, for just what constitutes education is not a question to be answered off-hand. Some people can be as well instructed by music, dramatics or allegories, as others by lectures. In attempting to improve the mind by the former course, though, requires more careful selection of the class of matter served for instruction. In view of the variety of methods in which instruction may be imparted therefore, it is questionable whether the introduction of musical, dramatic and elocutionary programmes are, after all, violations of the spirit of the endowment.

Be that matter as it may, it is probable that a conscientious regard for what has been interpreted as the letter and spirit of Mr. Peabody's munificence by the present committee of it, that has led to the selection of the coming course and it is possible the question of expense, which is a matter the committee claim they have been obliged to carefully consider this year, may have had some influence in moulding the character of the course.

It is intimated by those in position to know, that the endowment may at no remote period fail to support the institution and the town be called upon to contribute pecuniarily toward the maintenance. The statement seems almost incredible, but we cannot say that it is without foundation. We can simply hope that the fears are based upon the temporary depressions that will not exist hereafter.

Stop and Think.

How much money you have thrown away buying worthless medicines, prepared by unprinciples parties, who care not what harm they may do to your system. You can depend on every bottle of Sulphur Bitters as being a reliable medicine. It searches out and cleanses from the blood all impure matter, and makes you feel like a new man.

A party of grocer clerks from Danvers spent the evening at the Placida Boxford recently. They did not arrive until after 8, and at 10 o'clock they sat around a finely spread table prepared by the proprietor, Mr. Magdon. They were transported in a large four horse barge and the party numbered twenty-two. They enjoyed themselves very much and left at midnight.

NOTED AND QUOTED.

Say what you may, the Democrats of Massachusetts have endorsed the Republican position on the silver question. Give them time enough, and they'll come around all right on the tariff question also.—Milford Journal.
